some years ago was Frankish, and ridicules those who call it Venetian. Yet the traces of gunpowder on the inner stones of that tower demonstrated that it was Venetian it was Turkish; in no case work of the thirteenth century. He speaks of the Homeric lis and Loire being cognate, and suggesting the unity of the whole Aryan family, whereas lis is the ordinary Phœnician and Hebrew name for the lion (𐤋𐤍). He talks of "Mykene as the head of Hellas," though he knew perfectly that Hellas and Mycene never existed together. If he was a specialist in anything, we thought it was in questions of architecture, yet he does not know why the empty triangle appears over the lintels of the Mycæan gateways and treasuries. Still worse, because he sees the square pilaster at the corner of the cella at Sunium, he actually tells us that this was a temple in antis! The contrast of such a temple and the peripteral is so elementary a conception in Greek architecture, and the temple of Sunium is so plainly of the latter class, that we wonder what Mr. Freeman would have said about any other author he had caught in such a blunder. There are larger questions which we can hardly discuss here. To call the skirmish at Marathon, which did not stop Persian invasions of Greece, a turning-point in the world's history, is surely quite wrong. If the Athenians had been defeated then, it is not at all likely that Greece would have submitted to, or rather remained in submission to, the Persians. These things depend not on the issue of one fight, but on the character of the contending nations. The criticisms we have made are on the substance of the book. It is needless to say that it is in many respects antiquated, and even ignores many great things already known in his day. Of this the signal instance is the chapter on Olympia, where he finds the museum locked and the key gone, and consoles himself and his reader that museums are a bore, and that after all a wretched little Byzantine church which he finds open has more historical interest than the work of Pæonius or of Praxiteles. We said above that Mr. Freeman challenges criticism; otherwise we had contented ourselves with praising the admirable way in which a man of great culture sees in every historical object many and divers interests.

Round the World by Doctors' Orders. By John Dale, J.P. (Stock.)—This is one of that large body of works which are "written without any idea of publication," and which "pretend to no literary merit," but of which the author has nevertheless followed the time-honoured practice, in these cases, of referring the question of publication to "the advice and counsel of many friends," with, of course, the usual result. We have before had occasion to speak plainly of some of these diaries of the modern circumnavigator, which, claiming to rank as works of travel, are become the bane of "geographical" literature; but there are no symptoms of abatement of the nuisance. It is, we need not say, no disparagement to, apparently, a very worthy gentleman that the letters which amused the circle of his "fireside friends" in Yorkshire will not bear the fuller and colder light which falls on the printed page. He might remember, indeed, while travelling over the well-beaten track, that everything which a passing traveller, with no exceptional gifts of observation or expression, can say has been said over and over. But if he will write a book, let him at least pull himself together, and avoid slipshod English and bad spelling. Of mild joking and general superficiality it is hopeless to complain, as they seem of the essence of such a work. What human being can be the happier for the bare record in diary form of such phenomena as fine sunsets or flying fish! On shore, indeed, he chats away amiably, keeping well to the surface of things, through New Zealand, Japan, and California; and any one who wishes to know, and does not yet know, what the Canadian Pacific Railway is like will find such information here. We had imagined that the composition of the Australian Barrier Reef was pretty well ascertained. Mr. Dale, however, contrasting perhaps in his mind the great size of the reef with the minuteness of the alleged workers, writes with caution. The reef "is said to be constructed by 'coral insects.'" But he has no hesitation in asserting the advantages of "European rule" in Shanghai! He went to see the pigs killed at Chicago. This is hardly legitimate sightseeing, and we are further surprised that an Englishman of principle and refinement should have twice "assisted" at the judicial torture of prisoners in China; but perhaps the author is one of the new J.P.s, and was travelling to gain magisterial experience. In this case, perhaps, we should excuse the misspelling of names in the remote Pacific and of scientific terms, and an unfortunate attempt at a Latin quotation; but he should not write of the "Josts" and "Jost-houses" in China, or of the Lodo at Venice, or of Monte Nurro and the Salfatara at Naples. Also, when one's French is rusty it is dangerous to air it even in such small expressions as "bon bouche," "petit baggage," or "à la Anglais." Here his proof-reader might have taken better care of him.

In the Track of the Sun: Readings from the Diary of a Globe Trotter. By Frederick Diodati Thompson. With many illustrations by Mr. Harry Fenn and from Photographs. (Heinemann.)—Mr. Thompson is not of the class of authors who publish with affected reluctance, or with the timid hope of affording his readers a little amusement, or even, haply, some instruction. His volume, if somewhat heavy to handle, is most handsomely turned out, with a copious supply of large illustrations, all effective if not all absolutely new, and some of them artistic. His diary moves on with measured tread, like the sun whose track it follows, through scenes now familiar to every reader of travels; and if his observations are not often original, at all events his style shows considerable power of condensation. Too often, indeed, he merely records the bare fact that he has seen this or that temple, or landscape, or other well-known object of interest, and the same space is allotted to the record of a good dinner or a hot bath. This produces an egotistical effect, and throughout the book the first personal pronoun is unduly prominent. There is, however, a certain assurance and directness of style, denoting the writer's conviction that even these minor statements will be received with attention—as perhaps they ought. At all events, it is interesting to know what an American of good position, who dedicates his book to the Sultan of Turkey, and always calls on other sultans and maharajahs and the right people generally, thinks of ourselves, of our Indian Government, and other matters. He claims for his countrymen a deep interest in the scenes of the Indian Mutiny, "for we Americans, being of the same race, take a kindred pride in the glorious deeds of England's soldiers." For himself, too, "the splendid old ritual of the Anglican Church sounds grand and impressive the world over." And yet, he says, "the two nationalities, as a rule, do not understand each other, and are not sympathetic. The English are undoubtedly very jealous of the wealth and power of the United States." Are they so, to any appreciable extent? As for the absence of mutual understanding, we may find some traces of this in the following. The writer suggests that the gentle, conciliatory manners of the Japanese may be due to what is practically a vegetable diet, and then asserts that the people most directly their opposite are the flesh-eating, spirit-drinking English, "who are, as every one knows, great bullies, both individually and as a nation." He does not say whether this applies to the race on both sides of the Atlantic, nor does he explain why the Japanese get on at least as well with the English as with any other foreigners, if not better. Like the generality of his countrymen, Mr. Thompson is a conscientious sightseer, and we do not make out that he allowed himself more than two days' rest on his tour. The first occasion was in Japan, where he took a day off to recruit after a painful operation of ten hours' duration, undergone at the hands of the fashionable tattooer. The other was at Madras, where he found on landing on New Year's Day that every place was closed, and so "I spent the morning quietly in reading up India." As the result of this reading and thirty-nine days' subsequent travelling, he pronounces favourably on British rule. There is much less crime, he is candidly "ashamed to admit, in India than in our own great republic." He considers only two reforms needful, the emancipation of women, and bimetalism. Brahminism, however, he finds "too vile for description," and thinks its "principles and practices" should be forcibly suppressed. Mr. Thompson makes a claim on behalf of his nation which we do not propose to dispute, viz., that "a population of 66 million has certainly a right to pronounce, spell, and speak as it chooses." We are the more flattered therefore that he has adopted for this handsome volume the mode of spelling practised in these islands. He disapproves, however, of the high-pitched voices of his countrywomen. Yet we hardly think his suggestion fortunate, that they should copy the voices of Italian women. At least, they might more easily find within the limits of the Anglo-Saxon race the "soft, gentle, and low" tones which he desires. He speaks of "Saracenic temples" at Elephantine, and writes Lord "Clive" for Clyde; but these are only isolated slips.

MR. G. W. WHITE, when living at Xeres, borrowed a horse from a friend and took some rides into the mountains, on one occasion getting as far as Ronda. He enjoyed his excursions, but that is no reason why he should have published The Heart and Songs of the Spanish Sierras (Fisher Unwin). Spain is not an unexplored country, as Mr. White supposes, and we have all seen the photographs of which Mr. White furnishes reproductions. His odd style—if that can be called a style which consists of alternate passages of the baldest of diary jottings and purple patches of would-be fine writing—is not attractive, and his proofs have been most imperfectly corrected. Besides, while he seems to have some acquaintance with colloquial Spanish, his knowledge of Spanish grammar and literature is painfully slight. At the outset he betrays his ignorance of the meaning of "montañas." For Spanish songs, on the other hand, Mr. White has a genuine liking, and if he were to study the subject, he might be able to write about it.

THE house of Calmann Lévy publish Les Italiens d'aujourd'hui, by M. René Bazin, a somewhat slight volume of travels which, though readable, is not equal to the former works of its author.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

It is not given to many writers to entrance us with the story of the large family. 'The Daisy Chain' is, perhaps, the most successful book of the kind; but there is only one Miss Yonge. Trusty in Fight; or, The Vicar's Boys, by the author of 'The Chorister Brothers' (Masters & Co.), is a long and somewhat shapeless family history; it begins at no particular point, and there seems to be no reason why it should ever end. The vicar has ten children, whose trivial lives and misfortunes are chronicled at great length and with much detail. The story, though dull, is quite harmless, and may find some readers.

Polly Oliver's Problem: a Story for Girls. By Kate Douglas Wiggin. (Gay & Bird.)—Mrs.

Wiggin's name is well known to all those interested in the training and education of young children on both sides of the Atlantic. Her books have, moreover, secured her a public larger than her admirable developments of the Kindergarten system could in the nature of things command. 'Children's Rights' was found pleasantly suggestive even by those strenuous modern parents whose own claims are more likely to be found sinking into abeyance than those of the rising generation, to whose improvement they devote themselves with such overwhelming and sometimes, alas! misguided zeal. 'Polly Oliver's Problem' will not add much to Mrs. Wiggin's reputation. It is full of right feeling, of high spirits, and of that sort of nonsense which is only taking when a very nice and pretty young girl is actually giving utterance to it. Schoolgirl fun hardly bears the severe test of being recorded in black and white, and Polly Oliver, good and courageous as she is, by no means surpasses the intellectual average of a very ordinary schoolgirl. The story of her devoted struggle to make life easier for her mother, both in the Californian boarding house and out of it at San Francisco, may amuse, and ought certainly to instruct, other young persons of sixteen. She does not become more interesting as she goes on, however, and the story drags slowly on its course after Mrs. Oliver's death and her orphan daughter's adoption by the opulent and childless Mrs. Bird. Polly's discovery of her gift for telling stories may prove a useful suggestion to other girls in real life. Her friend Edgar appears to promise a touch of future romance for Polly; but she is not allowed to be precocious in this respect. The illustrations are pretty.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MESSRS. MARCUS WARD & Co. publish The Civic Reader, a little treatise on civic rights and duties, edited by two gentlemen, of whom the first named is Mr. Harris Stone. It is well intended, but full of errors in almost all its parts, although several writers are mentioned as having taken part in its compilation, in addition to the editors. It is hard to say whether the account of Parliament or of local government is the more defective and misleading. There is, however, no blunder contained in the book that is not contradicted, at least by implication, in some other part of it; so that it is clear that the editors cannot have grasped their subject. For instance, the constitution of Unions is explained with tolerable accuracy, but in an earlier passage we are told that the Board of Guardians is the centre of local government in the Hundreds, and that each Board consists of the county magistrates residing in the Hundred and of elected members. There is, of course, no connexion whatever between Unions and Hundreds. There are Unions of every conceivable shape, and Unions continuous, perhaps, with every conceivable other area within a county, and we will not, therefore, say that there are not any Unions anywhere which are accidentally the same as Hundreds; but we will venture to assert that in the vast majority of cases the three main historical rural areas—the Hundred, the Petty Sessional Division, and the Union—have no connexion with one another. In many counties the Hundreds have, for practical purposes, ceased to exist, and their boundaries are known only to antiquaries. In a good many cases the Hundreds are dispersed, the parishes contained in them not being geographically connected. In the more accurate account of Unions there is a different error, for we are told that the larger towns were in 1834 made into separate Unions. This statement is generally, although not invariably, untrue. For instance, certainly three, and we believe all four, of the four largest County Boroughs or cities are in several Unions, the object of the Commissioners having been to carry out their instructions by bringing the urban and rural districts together. Leeds forms a typical case of what has happened. There three Unions meet in the centre of Leeds, and each takes a slice of the town with a large district outside the town attached. In the map of administrative counties the name of Middlesex is omitted, although that of Rutland, a smaller county, is given. It is hardly accurate to say, in the account of administrative counties, that the Isle of Ely has been separated from Cambridgeshire, and the Soke of Peterborough from Northamptonshire, inasmuch as the administrative counties mostly follow, except in the case of London (where a new county was cut out of parts of three old counties), the counties of the former county bench. Now we believe that the Isle of Ely and the Soke of Peterborough always had a separate commission of the peace. There is a misleading list of County Boroughs in order of population, at the bottom of which there is a note, "Qualified by population but not created County Boroughs." This note applies to Ystradgynodwg, Tottenham, and Merthyr Tydfil. Not only are these places not County Boroughs, but they are not municipal. The first named is an ordinary urban district with a Local Board; the second named forms two urban districts with Local Boards; and the third named, although a parliamentary borough since 1833, is for local government purposes an ordinary urban district with a Local Board. The authors rightly say, "Every borough which on the — had a population of — or was a county.....was admitted to be a.....County Borough." But then the places we have named and several others on the list, not being boroughs, do not come within this definition. The authors confidently assert that the county of London extends into four historic counties, and include Essex in their list. This may be so; but we thought that the portion of Woolwich which is known as North Woolwich, and lies north of the Thames on what is called the Essex shore, was, like the rest of the parish of Woolwich, a portion of the county of Kent. The statement that the county of London encloses fifty-nine parliamentary boroughs is absolutely incorrect. What is meant, no doubt, is parliamentary divisions, which is a very different thing. In the chapter on sanitation, the words "sanitary districts" are used in almost every passage for urban sanitary districts, without explanation, and rural sanitary districts are improperly excluded from consideration in this connexion. It would be useless to analyze the errors contained in the account of Parliament, one of the most startling being that which tells us that "the three Secretaries of State—Home, Foreign, and Colonial—are always members of the Cabinet. It would almost seem as though this passage had been extracted from some work of reference of the early part of the century, before the Colonial Office and War Office had assumed their present form, and before the India Office had been created. In a few remarks on closure we are told that such rules "are dangerous; for, in the hands of an autocratic leader of the Opposition....." What an autocratic leader of the Opposition has to do with closure, except to endure it, we do not know. We suppose that "Opposition" is a slip for Government, but it is an odd one.

WHY Prof. Georg Ebers should have thought it needful to tell the public The Story of my Life from Childhood to Manhood (Hirschfeld Brothers) does not appear from the book, for, with the exception that his childhood fell in the days of the revolutionary troubles of 1848, it really contains no feature that distinguishes it from the life of most well-behaved and studious young men. The narrative, too, breaks off at the very point where, perhaps, it might become of interest, namely, when Prof. Ebers has entered upon manhood, and might have something of real interest to tell. It is told, too, with that heavy-handedness, that self-complacency, that delight in enouncing well-worn commonplaces, which distinguish the writer's novels and render them such dreary reading. The translation of this volume, due to Miss Mary G. Safford, is smoothly and correctly done.

A Treatise on Wines. By J. L. W. Thudichum, M.D. (Bell & Sons).—When Messrs. Bell arranged with Dr. Thudichum to rewrite the work on wines of the late Cyrus Redding, they certainly selected one of the best-known experts on the subject. Dr. Thudichum has had very large practice both in the analysis of wines in the laboratory and in the examination of their growth and production on the spot; and the elaborate work which he published some twenty years ago in conjunction with Dr. Dupré is still a kind of standard on the matter. It is, however, the experience of the experienced that a man is sometimes rather hampered than helped by the existence of former works of his own on the subject with which he deals; and we are not sure that this is not to some extent the case with Dr. Thudichum here. In some respects his book attempts rather too much, and in others it gives rather too little. It was obviously impossible to survey all the wines of the world in regard to once of their history, their cultivation, their manufacture, their chemical aspect, and their gastronomic or æsthetic quality, in a crown octavo of fewer than four hundred pages; and the trust of all proverbs about qui trop embrasse has its truth justified here. One may, for instance, regard the wines of Italy and of Australia with very little affection. But both have arrived at a considerable consumption in the English market; and nothing useful can possibly be said about the wines of Italy (including Sicily) in three pages and a half—about the wines of Australia in a single page of the merest generalities. Even where Dr. Thudichum allots much more space and enters into much more detail, as in the case of the wines of France, Germany, Spain, and Portugal, he seems distracted between the claims of many different groups of possible readers; and the result, we should think, will be hardly satisfactory to any. In particular, the learned doctor's interest in wine seems to cease where that of most wine-lovers begins—at the moment that it enters the cellar. He tells us very little of different vineyards, next to nothing of different vintages; yet the history of the vintages of the last twenty-five years in the great vine countries is of the most interesting character. When he does venture a critical remark—as, for instance, that champagne “does not improve, but deteriorates” after a few years—we have the misfortune frequently to differ with him. The one wine on which he has produced a section which is almost a monograph, and a very good one, is sherry; and this, unjustly no doubt, is now at a greater discount with the British wine-drinker than any other. With regard to the rest, he is interesting on the subject of culture and manufacture, and, man of science though he be, intimates a frank and abashed distrust of the power of mere analysis to indicate the qualities and characteristics of wine. We are not very fond of dictating to authors the way in which they ought to write or ought to have written their books. But we cannot help thinking that it would have been better if Dr. Thudichum had confined himself to a treatise on “wine as it is made,” illustrating the general processes of the growth of the vine and the treatment of the juice by such individual differences as seemed to him most noteworthy; and had left to a different hand, or, at any rate, a different volume, the consideration of the finished product in the various and almost innumerable forms in which it makes glad (or sad) the heart of man. For this latter purpose his really excellent scientific acquirements are but of secondary value; and it requires, to say nothing of the taste which he may or may not possess, a much lighter style and a greater faculty of illustration and reference, literary and historical, than he seems to have at his disposal.

We have no previous acquaintance with Mr. William Armstrong Collins, whose little book of detached reflections on things in general, bearing the appropriate title At Long and Short Range, comes to us from Philadelphia (Lippincott & Co.). A book of this kind is almost always a dangerous venture; for even to attain a moderate success it must exhibit such qualities of a high order as a wide observation, a fund of original thought, a mastery of fine expression. Mr. Collins here makes a respectable endeavour to succeed; and if the reader be in no very critical or cantankerous temper, he will find much agreeable writing in these pages; indeed, if amongst the American authors who have still to make a reputation here there are many who can write as prettily, we shall be glad to know it. Mr. Collins is happily not concerned to be very profound, nor does he show any tendency to yield to the temptation—ever present to all writers of paragraphs—to say what is merely smart or cynical. He assumes a modest attitude, takes a benevolent view of human affairs, has a ready sympathy with nature in all her aspects, and utters his best things with a healthy and playful air which makes them all the more welcome.

THE new Revue de Paris (Asher & Co.) we announced in December last has made its appearance. It may be doubted if the title be happily chosen, as there have been already two Reviues de Paris, the one which Buloz edited and that in which ‘Madame Bovary’ was published. However, the first number of the new magazine is a signal exception to the rule that first numbers are bad. Balzac's letters to his future wife are decidedly interesting, and the sketch of Philo is marked by M. Renan's delicacy and sureness of touch. M. Jussier writes very pleasantly about James I. of Scotland. On the other hand, Pierre Loti's article on the convent of Loyola is somewhat of a pot-boiler, and M. Magnard has nothing particularly new to say regarding the Napoleonic legend. Gyp and M. G. d'Annunzio contribute the fiction. In the way of frivolity the editors intend, it is understood, to draw the line at Gyp.

WE HAVE on our table Oliver Wendell Holmes, by W. Jerrold (Sonnenschein).—Milton: L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and Lycidas, with Explanatory Notes, &c., by F. Gorae (Relfe Brothers).—Cinque-Mars, ou une Conjuration sous Louis XIII., by Comte Alfred de Vigny, edited by O. Bankey (Isbister).—Morceaux choisis d'Alphonse Daudet, edited by F. W. YORKSHIRE SCHOOLS.

2, Thanet Place, Temple Bar, Feb. 10, 1894.

THE notoriety of bad schools in Yorkshire (a phenomenon, I suppose, naturally connected with the great size of that wild county, its remoteness from great centres of civilization, &c.) must be older by a good deal than 1820. I was struck by an allusion to it in one of Foote's farces—"The Minor" I think, but have not the reference by me. Samuel Foote died in 1777.

G. H. POWELL.

THE old trials that J. D. asks about took place October 23rd and 24th, 1823. They show on the part of the schoolmaster great ignorance of sanitary matters, and a culpable amount of carelessness, but no trace of the villainy so graphically painted in by Dickens. They likewise show that if the feeding was rough it was fairly plentiful. I have two copies of these trials by me, but as they are taken from local weekly papers (price sevenpence each in those days, and small at that) they do not give a very good account, and especially they fail to report the evidence given by the witnesses for the defence.

The charges of starving the boys broke down, but the verdicts went against the schoolmaster on the charges of carelessness and neglect.

JACMAR.

ROGER BACON AND BARTHOLOMEW ANGLICUS.

Oxford, Feb. 3, 1894.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Robert Steele is so good as to dignify me by a title to which I have no claim, I cannot truly say that he has come any nearer convincing me that his view is at all plausible. In his former letter (Athenæum, December 30th) he gave a whole string of reasons for holding that the Paris teacher attacked by Roger Bacon was the Franciscan Bartholomew. In reply I showed cause (Athenæum, January 13th) against these reasons one by one, and then in the last sentence of my note I mentioned the identification with St. Thomas Aquinas as "a tempting solution." Mr. Steele seems to admit the cogency of my criticism, since we now hear no more of the "eleven notes of identification" set out in his earlier letter; and he is concerned rather to prove that the unknown teacher is not St. Thomas than that he is Bartholomew. But he has an inconvenient habit of making assertions without giving references to his authorities, which makes discussion difficult. Thus he says that "it shows a certain want of familiarity with mediæval ways of thought to suggest that a book bought by the University of Paris to lend to poor students—a mere compilation—would not be quoted as equal to Aristotle or Avicenna." Not every reader of the Athenæum has Denife's 'Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis' at hand to enable him to expose Mr. Steele's blunder, and to find out that there was no question of the book being "bought by the university" at all. It is simply included in a list of prices fixed by the university, at which books might be lent by the booksellers to students—not necessarily poor students; for it was a sort of circulating library system, and the prices were fixed in order to prevent extortionate charges ('Chartul.', i. 644). Many books are mentioned, not because they were of special fame, but because they were in current use.

As I have not adopted as proved the suggested identification of the unknown teacher with St. Thomas Aquinas, it is not necessary that I should say more on the subject than that Mr. Steele's arguments do not appear to me to render that identification in any way less probable. I cannot, indeed, understand the relevance of his reminder "that 'philosophia' was not identical with 'theologia' in any mediæval university"; but if Mr. Steele will set himself to find out, first what the expression "primus magister de philosophia" (Bacon, 'Op. Min.', p. 327) means, and secondly to what person it can appropriately apply, he may be able to throw light upon an obscure episode in the university history of the thirteenth century. Meanwhile the object of my former letter—namely, to show the untenableness of the Bartholomew theory—may be assumed, in the absence of argument against it, to be attained.

REGINALD L. POOLE.

THE PHILADELPHIA REPRINT OF THE 'LYRICAL BALLADS.'

In the bibliography attached to his recently published "Aldine edition" of Wordsworth's poems, Prof. Dowden mentions the American reprint of the 'Lyrical Ballads,' but states that he has never seen it. It is also mentioned by Prof. Knight, but obviously on hearsay authority. Some years ago I bought a copy at Messrs. Puttick's auction-rooms, and as the book would appear to be very rare, I venture to think that a brief account of it may prove interesting to some of your readers.

Perhaps it will be convenient to begin by transcribing the publisher's "Advertisement," which is printed on the back of the table of "Contents" of the first volume:—

Advertisement.

At the same time that the Editor begs leave to offer the following as the cause of the little delay that has taken place in the Publication of these Poems, he begs also respectfully to present his Thanks to those who have been pleased to favour them with their encouragement by Subscription.

So rapid appears to have been the Sale of these Poems in London after the Publication of the Second Volume the last summer, that another Edition has been already since published. This, containing the following lengthy Preface, the beautiful Ode to Love, and some additional explanatory Notes, more than the former Edition, did not reach this Country, till after the present one had been put to press, and the First Volume nearly finished. Some little delay, has arisen from this circumstance, but, at the same time, it has enabled the Editor to give the Work complete, which otherwise would not have been the case; and though attended with considerable more expense than he calculated upon when he put it to press, it will be delivered to the Subscribers at the Price mentioned in his Proposal. The only difference that now exists between this and the last London Edition is, that the Poem entitled the 'Convict,' is retained in this Edition, but omitted in that, and that the Arrangement of the Poems in the First Volume somewhat differs. The Reader, however, by turning to them as they follow in the preceding Table of Contents, will have them as they are arranged in the last London Edition.

JAMES HUMPHREYS.

Philadelphia, January, 1802.

This document calls for some remarks. The writer seems to have been under the erroneous impression that the second volume appeared separately in the summer of 1801, and that subsequently a fresh and complete edition in two volumes was published. As a matter of fact, the only edition of the 'Lyrical Ballads' which appeared between the publication of the single and anonymous volume, in the autumn of 1798, and the date of Mr. Humphreys's "Advertisement," was the edition in two volumes, dated "1800," but actually published in January, 1801. Vol. i. was then properly described as "Second Edition," while vol. ii. appeared as a new book. Another edition appeared in 1802, but later than January, so that Mr. Humphreys could have known nothing about it. He may have been misled by the fact that in 1801 the second volume was, for the convenience of those who already possessed the 1798 volume, sold separately. I have a copy of ed. 1798 bound up with vol. ii. of "1800," the binding having every appearance of being contemporary.

Mr. Humphreys says that his edition differs from the London copy only in the arrangement of the poems and in the retention of 'The Convict'; but this is misleading, as might have been surmised from his remark that the printing of the first volume had been nearly finished when the London edition of 1800 reached him. His first volume differs materially from that of 1800, for he did not cancel the sheets he had reprinted from the 1798 copy. A collation of his first volume will best show how it was made up:—

"Lyrical Ballads, | with | other poems: | in two volumes. | By W. Wordsworth. | [Motto.] | Vol. I. | From the London second edition. | Philadelphia: | Printed and sold by James Humphreys, | At the N.W. Corner of Walnut and Dock-street. | 1802." (One leaf.)

"Contents. | Vol. I." | (Titles in order of 1800, plus 'The Convict.') This fills one page, and on the back is printed the "Advertisement." (One leaf.)

"Preface." (A reprint of that of 1800.) Nine leaves. Its first page is unnumbered, but has at foot the signature "b." Its second is numbered "vi," and its last, "xxii." P. ix has the signature "b 2," and p. xvii, "c."

Then follows the text, beginning with 'Love,' which occupies five pages, numbered 1-5. On the back of p. 5 is printed the half-title, 'The Ancient Mariner, A Poet's Reverie' (the altered title of 1800), followed by the 'Argument' (the text of which is also that of 1800). This would have been p. 6. Then begins, on what would have been p. 7, the poem itself, but it has the old 1798 heading and spelling—"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner." In seven parts; and on turning over the leaf one finds the next page numbered "14," and so the pagination goes on to the "End of the first volume" on p. 159. In all this part of the volume—pp. 13-159—the text and order of the poems follow those of 1798, and therefore differ materially from those of "the second London edition." The signature of the page (13) on which the 'Rime' begins is "Vol. I. b." P. 17 has "Vol. I. b 2"; p. 25 has "Vol. I. c"; and so the signatures run, until they end with "Vol. I. o," which appears on the last leaf but one of the volume.

As Mr. Humphreys could have known nothing of a second volume when he began to set up the 'Lyrical Ballads' of 1798, the "Vol. I." of the signatures, and the words, "End of the first volume," must have been added by hand stamp—unless (which is improbable) the type of the whole volume had been kept standing unused until the second volume was received. The twelve pages which were to have preceded the 'Rime' were no doubt intended for—Title, 2 pp.; Wordsworth's Advertisement, 4 pp.; Contents, 2 pp.; Publisher's Advertisement, 2 pp.; and half-title and Argument to the 'Rime,' 2 pp. As the London list of errata is not reprinted, one would have expected that the five would have been silently corrected; but examination shows that only the fourth and fifth were attended to by the printer.

So much for the first volume. The net result of my investigation is that it is made up by adding to the text of the 1798 volume the new poem 'Love,' and the preface and other preliminary matter of ed. 1800. It follows that the description on the title-page and in the "Advertisement" of the American reprint is materially inaccurate.

The second volume is simply a reprint of the London "Vol. II." of ed. 1800. Its title-page is (but for the substitution of "Vol. II.") the same as that of Vol. I. The first sheet (which has no signature) consists of four leaves, which contain, respectively, the title-page, contents, half-title of 'Hart-leap Well,' and the first eight stanzas of that poem. "Vol. II. b" begins on p. 9, "Vol. II. a 2" on p. 13, and so the signatures run on to the end of "o." "r" has four leaves, ending the volume on p. 172.

In the London edition a list of three errata is given, but of these only the first and second have been corrected. The unnoted, but very obvious misprint of "On" for "In" in the seventeenth line of 'The Fountain' is left uncorrected; but "household," in the thirteenth stanza, has been supplied with the missing letter, which Wordsworth himself left out until 1805.

Another unnoted, but peculiarly noticeable misprint in the 'Inscription' ('Rude is this edifice'), of "unborn" for unborn, has been repeated in the Philadelphia edition. It may be worth mentioning, perhaps, that the sixth line of 'Lucy Gray' appears in the Philadelphia edition as She dwelt on a wide moor.

In some copies of the London edition it is so printed, and in others,

She dwelt on a wild moor.

Wild may have been a misprint, or wide an afterthought, and the alteration to wide must have been made while the volume was at press, for we read wide in all editions after 1800.

I see that I have omitted to mention that the Philadelphia reprint is of the size usually called duodecimo, although the paper is a little larger than that of the London edition.

I do not think there is any more to be said about the differences which exist between this so-called reprint and its London original. If we have to condemn Mr. Humphreys for deceiving his subscribers with regard to the first volume, we must credit him with great liberality in giving the second one for nothing. The surprising thing about the whole affair is that, notwithstanding the mingled obloquy and neglect with which the volume of 1798 was received in its native land, there should have been a demand for a reprint in America. I do not remember to have met with any indication in the published correspondence of either Wordsworth or Coleridge of their having become aware that the 'Lyrical Ballads' had been reprinted—an event which if it had been heard of at the time would have cheered them, and interested them not a little had the news reached them in later years.

J. D. C.

THE BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

MR. T. A. ARCHER writes:—

"Will you allow me to correct by means of your columns two clerical slips that occur in my 'Battle of Hastings' in the current number of the English Historical Review?"

"1. On p. 38 (ll. 17-18) I have incidentally quoted the Quarterly Review's words 'referring not to a palisade, but to the shield wall,' as though he had confined them to ll. 7815-6 of the 'Roman de Rou' only. He uses the expression when speaking of the arkle passage (ll. 7815-26), not merely of these two lines.

"2. On p. 40 (ll. 30-2) I have accidentally written 'Wace' when I should, of course, have written 'William of Malmesbury.' The sentence should run thus: 'I need hardly say that I am quite guiltless of any special application of this theory to William of Malmesbury or any one else.'

"The MS. of my last few pages went astray in the confusion of Christmas week; consequently the later paragraphs of my paper had to be set up from a rough first draft and not from my revised copy.

"I may add that about two-thirds down p. 40 (l. 33) my revised copy contained the words 'It [i.e., the theory] would not work.' I should like to restore this sentence to its place—after the words 'conceived it,' and before the words 'may I not fairly hope,' &c. It is perhaps worth remarking that, in the body of my paper (p. 27, foot-note), 'Anselm,' Richard I.'s poet, should, of course, be 'Ambrose'; and on p. 35 (foot-note), 'Benedict of Ste. Maure, Geoffrey Gaimar,' &c., be 'Benedict of Ste. Maure [or St. Maur],' &c."

M. MAXIME DU CAMP.

M. MAXIME DU CAMP, who died last week when he had just entered upon his seventy-third year (for he was born February 8th, 1822), was a man of letters to whom the gods were kind, and who had led a rather unusually varied and well-filled life of almost complete leisure. He was well off, his father, a surgeon of eminence, having died when Maxime was very young, and left him a sufficient fortune. In 1844 he set out for the East, and travelled for the best part of two years. On his return he devoted himself to the then young art of photography, by which, however, he was not so absorbed as not to find time to carry a musket in the "days of June." Then he returned to the East with a mission which enabled him to photograph freely, and on his return once more set up (in 1851) the Revue de Paris, a title again resuscitated but the other day (see p. 212). In its phase under Du Camp it lived for some seven years, and had the honour of publishing among other things 'Madame Bovary,' but its difficulties with the censorship of the Empire were not small. M. Du Camp, however, was a persona grata to the administration, though not exactly of the innermost Bonapartist literary circle. He was with Garibaldi in Sicily. Then, towards the end of the Empire, he planned a very elaborate work on 'Paris,' which began to appear in the year before 1870, and was completed in six volumes six years later. Only the downfall of Napoleon III. prevented M. Du Camp from entering the Senate, to which he was actually nominated in July, 1870. He subsequently took up a strong line of attack on the Commune, which, while it made him most unpopular with the Extreme Left in French politics, was thought to have facilitated his election to the Academy in 1880. Two years later appeared his well-known 'Memoirs,' in which certain of Flaubert's friends thought that the novelist (then just dead) was treated indiscreetly and unfairly, but which were, on the whole, widely and deservedly popular. His last book, a series of 'Thoughts on the Present State of France,' from the standpoint of a disillusioned, but not cynical septuagenarian, appeared last year. Besides the books mentioned, M. Du Camp occupied his long life and complete leisure with writing pretty continually, his other books being chiefly travels and art criticism. Although not exactly a great writer, he was master of a capital French style, and had a good deal both of taste and of justness of thought. But he was something of a "looker-on" both in life and in letters, both in politics and in other matters. And while this detached and dilettante attitude accounts perhaps for the irritation which he aroused from time to time, it no doubt accounts likewise for his not having attained a more distinct literary excellence.

Literary Gossip.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN, lately Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces, is engaged on a biography of his father for Sir William Hunter's "Rulers of India" series. The Colvins are the only great Anglo-Indian family of which a father and son have governed the same Indian province. The present 'Life' will exhibit the inner working of Indian administration, from Mr. Colvin's appointment as private secretary to Lord Auckland, through the stirring times of Hardinge and Dalhousie, down to his death in Agra during the first disastrous months of the Mutiny of 1857. It will be entitled 'John Russell Colvin, last Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces under the Company.'

MR. FRANK HARRIS has, it is understood, undertaken the editorship of the National Observer.

MR. LECKY has been elected to fill the place on the committee of the London Library vacated by the death of Mr. W. Watkins Lloyd.

MR. LANG has been following up his recent study of "spooks," and Messrs. Longman are to publish for him a series of papers on 'The Cock Lane Ghost and Common Sense.' The contents of the volume may be judged from the headings of the chapters: Savage Spiritualism—Classical Spiritualism—Comparative Psychical Research—Haunted Houses—The Cock Lane Ghost—Hallucinations, Wraiths, and Ghosts—Crystal-gazing—Second Sight—Ghosts in Courts of Justice—A Modern Trial for Witchcraft—Presbyterian Ghost-hunters—The Logic of Table-turning—The Ghost Theory of the Origin of Religion. Mr. Lang is also going to issue a new volume of poems, 'Ban and Arrière Ban: a Rally of Fugitive Rhymes.' Mr. Maskelyne invites to his volume on 'Plats and Sharps,' which the same firm are to publish, "the attention of that majority spoken of by Carlyle, and which may be said to include all gamblers."

A CONFERENCE was held at Oxford on Thursday to consider the question of Entrance Scholarships, and at Cambridge the Vice-Chancellor has summoned a meeting to discuss the same subject; so it is not impossible the two universities may take common action in the matter.

MR. POULTNEY BIGLOW will contribute to Harper's Magazine for April an article on 'The German Emperor's Crack Stud Farm and Hunting Forest at Trakehnen and Rominten in East Prussia.' The article will be illustrated by Mr. Frederic Remington from drawings made by the artist at the places described. Mr. Edwin A. Abbey will contribute to the same number of Harper nine illustrations for 'A Winter's Tale.' The accompanying comment on the comedy has been written by Mr. Andrew Lang.

MISS LAURENCE ALMA TADEMA, whose first book, 'Love's Martyr,' enjoyed a considerable success six or seven years ago, and who has published nothing since, has completed a second novel. It is entitled 'The Wings of Icarus,' and will shortly be issued by Mr. Heinemann.

'THE ENGLISH SENATE' is the title which Mr. George W. Smalley has given to an article on the House of Lords which will appear in Harper's Magazine for April.

THE new volume of "The Canterbury Poets," which will be published towards the end of April, is to be an anthology of nature poems, edited by Mrs. E. Wingate Rinder. Unlike most compilations of the kind, it is to consist, not of a series of merely descriptive pieces, but of complete poems, interpretative rather than descriptive. Mrs. Wingate Rinder's idea has been favourably received, and she has already secured the assistance of many writers of note. The selections are to be from the writings of living poets only, as the aim of the anthology is to exemplify the nature poetry of "the later Victorians."

THE volume which will follow Mr. William Sharp's 'Vistas' in "The Regent Library" of Mr. Frank Murray, of Derby, will appeal more particularly to those who are interested in that Celtic renaissance of which as yet the ablest exponents have been Irish. 'Pharais: a Romance of the Isles,' by Miss Fiona Macleod, deals with a strange and tragic episode, the scene of which is laid among the remote and unfamiliar outer isles lying betwixt the Hebrides and the comparatively well-known islands close to the mainland. 'Pharais' will be published about the end of March.

It is proposed to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. Henderson, who for many years had been the manager of the business of Messrs. Blackwood & Sons, of Edinburgh, by a memorial, the form which it is to take to be decided by a committee which has been appointed to discuss the matter.

THE complete lecture by the late Mr. Lowell on 'Imagination,' hitherto only partially published in a newspaper report, will be printed in the March number of the Century.

A SOCIETY OF EDUCATION, for social intercourse and the discussion of educational and literary questions, is to be formed at King's College, chiefly for the benefit of the Queen's scholars, past and present, of whom the College receives a large number in the Arts Department. Mr. Victor Plarr will read a paper at the inaugural meeting on 'Education and Superstition.'

MESSRS. LONGMAN have in the press a 'History of Marriage, Jewish and Christian, in Relation to Divorce and Certain Forbidden Degrees,' by the new Dean of Lichfield, Dr. Luckock.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & FOSTER have arranged with the editor of "A Son of the Marshes" and with Prof. Boulger for the joint production of twelve volumes, to be entitled 'The Country Month by Month.' The first issue will appear on March 1st, and will be descriptive of that month.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK will publish immediately, uniform with the "Book-lover's Library," 'First Editions of American Authors,' a manual for book-lovers, edited by Mr. H. Stuart Stone.

PADRE COZZA-LUZI, sub-librarian, has just discovered in the Vatican collection a MS. of the 'Divina Commedia' of Dante, with miniatures of 1450. The work will probably be published with phototype reproductions of the miniatures.

A VOLUME of 'Literary Papers,' consisting of lectures and addresses on various subjects, by the late Mr. John Lovell, formerly editor of the Liverpool Mercury and founder of the Press Association, is preparing (under the editorship of his daughter) for publication by Mr. Howell, of Liverpool.

FROM March 24th to 31st there is to be an important "Versammlung deutscher Historiker" in Leipzig. One business before the assembled historians will be the projected issue of a new edition of the Spruner-Menke atlas, especially with reference to the "Gau-Karten." Prof. Jäger, of Cologne, is to speak on the place of ancient history in the education of the modern scholar. There is also to be a report and discussion upon the present state of the German local historical societies and their publications.

PROF. JOH. VON DÜMICHEN, the Egyptologist, died at Strasbourg on February 7th. He was born in 1833 at Weisholz, in Silesia, and studied theology and philology at Berlin and Breslau from 1852 to 1855. From 1859 to 1862 he returned to Berlin to pursue his Egyptological studies under Lepsius and Brugsch. In the latter year he made his first journey into Egypt, Nubia, and the Sudan, returning in 1865. In 1868 he started upon a second journey. At the foundation of the German University in Alsace, Dümichen was nominated to the Chair of Egyptology. In 1875-76 he spent a great time in Egypt in order to complete the researches begun during his earlier journeys. He was a personal friend of the late Emperor Friedrich, whom he accompanied to the opening of the Suez Canal. A list of his works on the geography, inscriptions, architecture, and history of ancient Egypt would fill a column of this paper.

THE only Parliamentary Paper likely to interest our readers this week is Royal Commission on Labour, Indexes, Vol. III., Glossary of Technical Terms used in Evidence, &c. (10d.).

SCIENCE

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Euclid, Books I. to VI. With Notes and Exercises. By Daniel Brent, M.A. (Rivington, Percival & Co.)—It is not easy to introduce anything original into Euclid's Elements, yet Mr. Brent's painstaking work differs considerably from the general run of text-books. Whether its special characteristics are, on the whole, improvements is a question about which teachers will probably disagree. For ourselves, we are inclined to think that the author has erred on the side of over-refinement. The arrangement of each demonstration has a certain mechanical look about it, which, we fancy, would be more likely to repel than to attract the beginner. We are also of opinion that practical teachers, who have, above all things, to think of examination requirements, will not appreciate the long demonstrations, in their full syllogistic form (with major premise, minor premise, and conclusion), which Mr. Brent has given of the first fifteen propositions—in addition, however, be it said, to the customary demonstrations.

A Short Course in the Theory of Determinants. By Laenas Gifford Weld. (Macmillan & Co.)—Of this work it is sufficient to say that we think it has accomplished its modest aim of presenting the theory of determinants in the "simplest possible manner" for beginners. It lays claim to, and merits, no other praise.

Statics and Dynamics. By C. Geldard, M.A. (Longmans & Co.)—We find no great difference between this text-book and the many on the same subject which have preceded it from other authors. It is intended mainly for students preparing for elementary public examinations, such as the London Matriculation, the Sandhurst and Woolwich "Further," &c. The book is well arranged, fairly supplied with appropriate examples, and, we have no doubt, will sufficiently meet the needs of the numerous class for whom it has been written.

A B C Five-figure Logarithms for General Use. By C. J. Woodward, B.Sc. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)—A few years ago the author published a similar work, but containing mantissæ of numbers only. We then suggested to him the advisability of extending his happy index-design to logarithms of sines, cosines, &c. In the present handy little manual this suggestion has been carried out. By means of the lateral index the calculator can immediately open the book at the right page when the logarithm sought is that of a number; and when the required logarithm is that of a trigonometrical function, he can at once open either at the right page or very near it. We know of no tables so convenient for the ordinary every-day calculations of engineers, surveyors, and practical mathematicians generally.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

Two more small planets were discovered by M. Charlois at Nice on the night of the 29th ult., probably raising the whole number known to 384. No. 344, discovered by the same astronomer on the 15th of November, 1892, has received the name Desiderata.

The Nautical Almanac has recently been issued for 1897. The contents and arrangement are the same generally as those of the preceding year, the plan, then initiated, of publishing a separate "Part I." (containing such data as are more particularly required for navigational purposes) being also continued. An appendix gives the approximate places for the beginning of 1900 of 834 zodiacal stars which have been selected for use in the Nautical Almanac, the object being principally to obtain very accurate places of these stars from observations made on a uniform system. The only special phenomena in 1897 will be two annular eclipses of the sun, on February 1st and July 29th, neither of which will be visible in any part of Europe.

The Arago Medal of the Paris Academy for last year was awarded to two American astronomers—Prof. Asaph Hall, for his discovery (which had already been honoured by the Lalande Prize) of the two satellites of Mars in 1877, and Prof. Barnard, for his discovery of the small interior satellite of Jupiter in 1892. In reference to the latter the Comptes Rendus calls attention to the correspondence of the distance of this from Jupiter to an empirical law, developed by M. Gaussin in 1880, according to which the distances of the planets from the sun and those of the satellites from their primaries can be expressed by a formula in which certain numbers have to be determined for each system, in which they are then constant. According to this the Galilean first satellite of Jupiter is the third in order of progression, and Prof. Barnard's discovery nearly corresponds to the first place, so that it would appear probable that there is a second still smaller (or at any rate more difficult to see) beyond it. The nearest known satellite of Uranus (Ariel) occupies the fifth place in M. Gaussin's progression, pointing to four others revolving nearer the planet. Several gaps exist in the series formed for Saturn; and with regard to the planets, the so-called law fits them in continuously, but makes Mercury the eighth in order of progression, so that, although M. Gaussin cautiously remarks, "Cela ne veut pas dire qu'il doit exister sept autres planètes plus rapprochées du soleil," this is, of course, suggested.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Feb. 8.—Sir J. Evans, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Further Observations on the Organization of the Fossil Plants of the Coal Measures: Part I. Calamites, Calamostachys, and Sphenophyllum,' by Prof. W. C. Williamson and Dr. D. H. Scott; and 'Researches on the Germination of the Pollen Grain and the Nutrition of the Pollen Tube,' by Prof. J. R. Green.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—Feb. 12.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Sir P. Anderson, Sir C. Euan Smith, Rear-Admiral F. K. Van der Muelen, Capt. H. C. Howard, Capt. F. E. G. Skey, Dr. G. S. Robertson, Messrs. C. A. A. Barnes, W. H. Brittain, G. B. Chace, W. S. Desborough, J. E. Hall, C. Heape, G. Ormsby, H. J. Pearson, H. W. Smyth, and J. Weston.—The paper read was 'Johore,' by Mr. H. Lake.

GEOLOGICAL.—Feb. 7.—Mr. W. H. Hudleston, President, in the chair.—Messrs. A. Alcock, W. W. King, and S. S. Platt were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On some Cases of the Conversion of Compact Greenstones into Schists,' by Prof. T. G. Bonney; and 'The Waldensian Gneisses and their Place in the Cottian Sequence,' by Mr. J. W. Gregory.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Feb. 8.—Mr. A. W. Franke, President, in the chair.—Sir J. C. Robinson exhibited a number of palæolithic and neolithic implements found at Lee-on-the-Solent.—Mr. A. E. Murray read a note on a small Greek bell found at Thebes, with a dedicatory inscription by one Pyrrhias to the god Cabeirus and a boy, which he thought might be of some use in the future elucidation of the complex and difficult subject of the Caberit.—Mr. Payne read a paper on the discovery of the Roman walls of Rochester, in which he showed that, despite the opinions expressed by Mr. Roach Smith, there could be no doubt that large portions of the existing remains of the city wall were of Roman date. Detached pieces remained along the whole line of the north wall; Roman masonry formed the base of the east wall; the rounded south-east angle was entirely Roman and still standing to a considerable height; a long piece of core remained in the Deanery garden, and beyond it a fine length formed the division between the Norman cloister and frater of the priory; and, lastly, it could be seen beneath the early Norman river wall of the castle built by Bishop Gundulf. Mr. Payne further described the foundations of two other walls—a Norman one found by Mr. Hope in 1886, and another further south, lately traced by probing, doubtless built by Henry III. in 1235-6.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Feb. 7.—Mr. A. Wyon in the chair.—It was announced that Mr. Loftus Brock had an invitation had been received from the Lord Mayor of Manchester for the Association to hold this year's congress in that city, and that the invitation had been accepted.—Mr. C. Davis described some finds of prehistoric stone implements near Auckland, New Zealand, and exhibited two examples.—The Rev. J. B. Lewis reported the existence of an early font at Toller Forcortum Church, Dorset, which he supposed to have been a Roman altar.—Mr. Barrett described a medieval column now in a cellar at Castle Hedingham.—Dr. Fryer rendered a description of the casting of the bells of Llantrisant Church, South Wales, in the tower of the church in 1718.—This led to a discussion with respect to the casting bells on the spot by various itinerant bell founders, and many instances were reported. Among these, Mr. E. Way described the Bell Pit Field at Templeton, near Tiverton, where the church bells are believed to have been made.—A paper on ecclesiastical antiquities was then read by Mr. A. Oliver, illustrated by an exhibition of many examples of crucifixes and other objects of varying dates, indicating much diversity of design; various positions of the Saviour's head were shown, and in one example both hands were placed over the head. Some of the crosses were made to open to contain relics, and an example found in the Minorities had three cherubs' heads at the extremity of each arm of the cross. Among the examples was an elegant pax of fourteenth century date, in a framework a century or two later.—The second paper described an antiquarian tour in East Anglia, made by Mr. T. C. Hughes. Many of the lesser known churches of the district as well as others famous for their architectural beauty were described.

ARCHEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—Feb. 7.—Mr. E. Green in the chair.—Mr. R. W. Taylor exhibited and described a small coffer or box of stamped leather work of the early part of the fifteenth century. The top of the cover is richly ornamented with a floriated scroll of great beauty, the groundwork being pounced. The box was probably made for deeds, and still holds some, but of much later date.—Mr. C. T. Davis exhibited a rubbing of the little known brass at Aberdeen to Dr. D. Liddell, 1613. It is a foreign example, measuring 5 ft. 5 in. by 2 ft. 10 in., and is valuable in that the accounts for the making, carriage, and setting are preserved amongst the town accounts. From the same source the maker's name appears to be Jaspert Brydegrowne of Antwerp.—Mr. M. Stephenson exhibited and shortly described an almost complete collection of rubbings of brasses from the county of Surrey. These numbered about 130, without counting the inscriptions only.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Feb. 6.—Sir W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during January.—Mr. Slater exhibited a fine mounted specimen of the river-bog of Madagascar from the Tring Museum, and pointed out that three distinct species of this well-marked genus of Suidæ were now known to occur in the Ethiopian region. A communication from Mr. East gave an account of the habits of this animal as observed in Madagascar. Mr. Slater also exhibited a stuffed specimen of the white-billed great Northern diver (Columba adami) from Norway, and made remarks on the distribution of the species, and on its interest as occasionally occurring on the British coast.—Mr. F. E. Beddard gave an account of the development of the tadpole of an African frog (Xenopus variis), as observed in specimens of this batrachian hatched and reared in the Society's gardens.—Mr. C. W. Andrews gave an account of some remains of the extinct gigantic bird (Aepyornis) which had been recently received at the British Museum from several localities in Madagascar. These were referred to three species—E. muelleri, E. medius, and E. titan, the last being of larger size than even E. maximus. Another set of remains showed differences which might eventually prove to be of generic importance, and were, perhaps, referable to the newly established genus Muellerornis.—The Marquis of Hamilton made some observations on the antelopes met with by him during a recent excursion from the Pungue along the coast northwards towards the Zambesi.—Papers were read: by Prof. Howes, on synostosis and curvature of the spine in fishes, with especial reference to the common sole.—by Mr. M. Bartley, on the antelopes of the Pungue Valley, East Africa, as observed by him during a recent hunting expedition in that district, and by Mr. O. Thomas, on a new species of bat of the genus Stenoderma from Montserrat, West Indies, proposed to be called S. montserratense. This bat was stated to be very injurious to the cacao plantations in that island.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Feb. 7.—Capt. H. J. Elwes, President, in the chair.—The President announced that he had nominated Lord Walsingham, Prof. E. B. Poulton, and Col. C. Swinhoe Vice-Presidents for the session 1894-95.—Mr. W. F. Baker, Mr. P. M. Bright, Prof. L. C. Miall, and Mr. E. Wilson were elected Fellows.—Mr. Jenner-Weir exhibited, on behalf of Mr. J. M. Adye, a specimen of Phasia moneta, Fabr., which had been captured at Christchurch, Hants, and remarked that this species, which had been found in this country for the first time so recently as June, 1890, was apparently becoming a permanent resident here, as it had been since taken in several of the southern counties. He also remarked that Acanthium napellus, on which the larva fed, though rare in England as a wild plant, was very common in gardens. Mr. Jenner-Weir also exhibited a nearly black specimen of Venturia macularia, L., the yellow markings being reduced to a few small dots.—Mr. H. H. Druce exhibited a female specimen of Hypochrysoptera acintillans, lately received by him from Mlolo, New Ireland. He said that only the male of this species had been as yet described.—Mr. F. Knock exhibited and made remarks on a nest of the British trap-door spider, Atypus piceus, recently found near Hastings by Mrs. Knock.—Prof. W. F. H. Blandford stated that he had recently obtained an additional species of Scoliopteryx from Japan, which, though closely allied to the species he had formerly described, showed a very distinct modification of the male proteronum.—Mr. M. Jacoby exhibited and remarked on a specimen of Leptopyga pygmaea, Dally, which was doing much injury to sugar-cane in the Bombay Presidency.—Mr. G. C. Champion said he had found an allied species on bamboo.—Dr. F. A. Dixey read a paper—'which was illustrated by the oxyhydrogen lantern'—entitled 'On the Phylogeny of the Pierinae as illustrated by their Wing-Markings and Geographical Distribution.'—A long discussion ensued, in which the President, Col. Swinhoe, Messrs. Salvin, Jacoby, Jenner-Weir, Hampson, and Kenrick took part.—Dr. T. A. Chapman read a paper entitled 'Some Notes on those Species of Micro-Lepidoptera whose Larvæ are External Feeders, and chiefly on the Early Stages of Eriocrania calthella.'—Mr. Hampson and the President made some remarks on the subject of the paper.—Mr. H. H. Druce read a paper entitled 'Description of the Female of Hypochrysoptera acintillans, Butl.'—The Rev. Dr. Walker communicated a paper, by Mr. R. H. F. Rippon, entitled 'Description of a Variety of Ornithoptera (Priamoptera) urticellana.'

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Feb. 12.—Dr. C. Le Neve Foster in the chair.—Prof. Clowes delivered the fourth and concluding lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures, 'On the Detection and Estimation of Inflammable Gas and Vapour in the Air.'

Feb. 13.—A meeting of the Applied Arts Section was held, at which a paper 'On Modern Developments of Illustrated Journalism' was read by Mr. H. Townsend.

Feb. 14.—Mr. W. H. Preece in the chair.—A paper 'On the St. Pancras Electric Light Installation' was read by Prof. H. Robinson, in which a full account was given of the important work as carried out by him on behalf of the Vestry of St. Pancras.—A discussion followed.

SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.—Feb. 12.—Mr. W. A. McIntosh Valon, President for 1893, first occupied the chair, and presented the premiums awarded for papers read during his year of office, viz., the President's Gold Medal to Prof. V. B. Lowe, for his paper on 'Gas Substitutes'; the Bessemer Premium to Mr. R. N. Boyd, for his paper on 'Collieries and Colliery Engineering'; a Society's Premium to Mr. E. G. Mawbey, for his paper on the 'Leicester Main Drainage, &c.'; and a Society's Premium to Mr. R. Carey, for his paper on 'Hydraulic Lifts.'—Mr. Valon introduced the President for the present year, Mr. G. A. Goodwin, to the meeting, and retired from the chair.—The President, having taken the chair, delivered his address.

MATHEMATICAL.—Feb. 8.—Mr. A. B. Kempe, President, in the chair.—Miss E. Lees, Mr. F. W. Hill, and Major Hipsley were elected Members, and Miss Lees was subsequently admitted into the Society.—The President announced the recent decease of Mr. W. H. Rafter, for many years a colleague of Prof. Sylvester at Woolwich, and of Mr. W. Price, for twenty-two years an assistant master in University College School. Mr. Price was the author of a small, but sound, elementary work, entitled 'Energy and Motion.' On the death of his colleague, the Rev. W. S. Moses, he succeeded that gentleman as the editor of Light.—At the request of Lord Kelvin, and by the permission of the Council, Mr. J. J. Walker exhibited and described Lord Kelvin's models of his Tetrakaidkahedron.—An interesting discussion followed, in which Messrs. B. Roberts, Forsyth, Macmahon, Cunningham, Elliott, and the President took part.—Abstracts were communicated of the following papers: 'On a Class of Groups defined by Congruences,' by Prof. W. Burnside, and 'Some Properties of the Uninodal Quartic and Quintic having a Triple Point,' by Mr. W. R. Roberts.

PHYSICAL.—Feb. 9.—Annual General Meeting.—Prof. A. W. Rüchler, President, in the chair.—The annual report of the Council was read by the President.—Dr. Atkinson read the Treasurer's report and also an obituary notice of the late Prof. Tyndall.—The following gentlemen were elected to form the new Council: President, Prof. A. W. Rüchler; Vice-Presidents, Mr. W. Baily, Major-General E. R. Festing, Prof. J. Perry, and Prof. S. P. Thompson; Secretaries, Mr. H. M. Elder, Mr. T. H. Blakesley, and Mr. E. Hill; Treasurer, Dr. E. Atkinson; Demonstrator, Mr. Vernon Boys; Other Members of Council, Mr. S. Bidwell, Dr. W. E. Sumner, Prof. G. Fuller, Mr. J. Swinburne, Mr. J. Stoney, Mr. R. E. Baynes, Prof. G. M. Minchin, Mr. L. Fletcher, Prof. Henri, and Prof. S. Young.—At an ordinary science meeting, then held, Mr. O. G. Jones read a paper 'On the Viscosity of Liquids,' and exhibited the apparatus used in his experiments.—Prof. Everett, in a written communication, suggested that the motion of the liquid spheres be checked by using beads of quartz or glass.—Lord Rayleigh pointed out in a letter that the formula employed related to a solid sphere, and thought it not legitimate to use it for liquid spheres.—Mr. Watson, Dr. Sumner, Mr. Blakesley, Prof. Perry, and Mr. Boys took part in the discussion; so did Prof. S. P. Thompson, Dr. C. V. Burton, Mr. Trotter, and the President.—Mr. Jones replied.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Royal Academy, 8.—Sculpture, Mr. A. R. Murray.
- London Institution, 8.—English Birds of the Welsh Marches, Mr. J. G. Collins.
- National, 8.—A Reconstruction of the Chest of Cypselus, Mr. H. B. Jones.
- Surveyors' Institution, 8.—Adjourned Discussion on 'The London Streets and Buildings Bill (and of the London County Council)'.—Mr. R. H. Druce.
- Aristotelian, 8.—The Conception of the Soul in Plato and Aristotle, Mr. R. H. Druce.
- Society of Arts, 8.—The Operative Treatment of Arterial Disease, Lecture I., Mr. H. Stannus. (Junior Lecture.)
- Victoria Institute, 8.—The Physical Causation of Nature.
- Heliographical, 8.—Conservation and Jewish Literature, Rev. A. Levy.
- Tues. Royal Institution, 8.—Lectures on and Illustrations in Plastics and Sculpture, Prof. C. G. Brown.
- Sociological, 8.—Ocean Highways: their Bearing on the Food and Wages of Great Britain, Night II., Lord G. Hamilton.
- Society of Arts, 8.—The Arts and Industries of Belgium and the Antwerp Exhibition, 1894, M. E. G. G. G.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—Forging by Hydraulic Pressure, Mr. R. H. Druce.
- Zoological, 8.—Method of preserving certain invertebrates for Museum Exhibition, Dr. W. H. Druce. (Collection of Land-shells from the Canal Islands, Gulf of Nam, Dr. O. V. von Mollendorff.) 'List of the Hymenoptera Metamorphosis of the Families Anthracidae and Comptosidae collected by Mr. H. H. Smith in the Island of St. Vincent with Descriptions of New Genera and Species, Prof. F. H. Druce.
- Wed. Geological, 8.—Relation of the Tertiary and Quaternary of the Tertiary Volcanic Series of the Inner Hebrides, Sir A. Geikie.
- 'Note on the Green Nalidite, as occurring in the Compton Formation of Nova Scotia,' Mr. J. W. Thomson.
- Society of Arts, 8.—Electric Signalling without Wires, Mr. W. H. Druce.
- Meteorological, 8.—Temperature, Rainfall, and Sunshine of Los Palmas Grand Canary, Dr. J. C. Taylor.
- Philosophical, 8.—Observations on the 'Report on the Philosophical Observations for 1893,' Mr. R. Mawley. 'Comparative Observations with Two Thermometer Screens at Ilfracombe,' Mr. W. Marriott.
- Philology, 8.—H. Nicholas Arctura, Prof. R. Ansholt.
- Glass, 8.—Glass from Herculaneum, Mr. Dr. Ooster.
- Glass, 8.—Glass from Herculaneum, Mr. Dr. Ooster.
- Microscopical, 8.—Parasites, chiefly in the Gall-producing Copepod, Prof. G. H. Druce.
- British Archaeological Association, 8.—Hiding Balms (and Hiding the Water), Mr. R. H. Druce. (Painted Glass at Lambourn, Bucks, Dr. A. C. G. G.)
- Thurs. Royal Institution, 8.—The Past and Future of Mountains, Exploration, Mr. W. H. Druce.
- Royal Academy, 8.—Sculpture, Mr. A. R. Murray.
- London Institution, 8.—Opera, Its Evolution and Present Tendency, Mr. L. Mowbray.
- Geographical, 8.—The Mountains of Geography to History, Mr. H. J. Mowbray. (Educational Society.)
- Electrical, 8.—Method of testing the Magnetic Qualities of Iron, Mr. G. Kapp. 'Note on Parallel Working through Long Lines,' Mr. W. H. Druce.
- Antiquarian, 8.—British Character of Fifteenth Century Work, Mr. R. Mowbray. 'Painted Glass of St. Anthony and Dame Elizabeth in Norbury Church, Derbyshire,' Mr. R. Mowbray.

- FEB. United Service Institution, 3.—Machine Guns with Cavalry.
 Lieut. W. Asherforth Thomson.
 — Physical, 4.—Method of determining Refractive Indices. Mr.
 Listerwood. 'New Electrical Theorem.' Mr. F. H. Halseley.
 'The Attainment of Santa Rosa.' Prof. C. V. Berg.
 — Royal Institution, 5.—Transformations of Electric Currents.
 Prof. R. F. Thompson.
 — London Amateur Scientific—Annual General Meeting.
 Royal Institution, 7.—Ligals, with Special References to the Optical Discoveries of Newton. Lord Rayleigh.
 — Botanic, 11.—Section of Fellows.

Science Society.

THE Council of the Meteorological Society have arranged to hold at 25, Great George Street, from April 10th to 20th, an exhibition of instruments, photographs, and drawings relating to the representation and measurement of clouds.

ACCORDING to the resolution passed at the last session in Washington, the sixth International Geological Congress is to be held in Zurich from August 29th to September 2nd. In addition to the general meetings, special sessions have been arranged for the following departments—general geology, stratigraphy and paleontology, mineralogy and petrography. Two geological excursions, each of thirteen days' duration—one in the Jura and the other in the Alps—are also planned. Both parties are to meet in Lugano, where the Congress will be closed on September 16th. The business part of the two journeys is in the hands of a firm at Lausanne. The scientific part of the tours will be under the conduct of Profs. Renevier and Gollier, both of Geneva, assisted by local geological experts. The details of each tour have been published. There will also be a series of ten smaller geological excursions on foot.

MESSES. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a 'Handbook of Gold-Milling,' by Mr. Henry Louis, whose object is to provide technical instruction for millmen and also practical guidance for managers and managing directors of gold mines. The science of gold-milling has only lately obtained full recognition, and this is the first attempt to state it in a clear and concise form.

MESSES. MACMILLAN & Co. are about to publish a volume of 'Essays in Historical Chemistry,' by Prof. Thorpe. Consisting mainly of lectures and addresses given at various times during the last twenty years, the essays are now put together with the object of showing how the labours of some of the greatest masters of chemical science have contributed to its development. Among the chemists dealt with are Boyle, Priestley, Cavendish, Lavoisier, Faraday, Dumas, and Mendeleef.

MAJOR ARTHUR GLYN LEONARD, late 2nd East Lancashire Regiment, has written a monograph on 'The Camel, its Uses and Management.'

THEODOR V. MIDDENDORF, known as the explorer of Northern and Eastern Siberia between 1842 and 1844, and in 1873 of Ferghana, died near Dorpat, on the 28th of January, in his seventy-seventh year.

HERB E. HANSLICK, the well-known Austrian musical critic, thus writes of Prof. Billroth, the famous physician whom we have so lately lost. It has just appeared in the February number of the Rundschau, in which journal this author's reminiscences are being published:—

"I could name no personage, certainly no one who had come from North Germany, who enjoyed to general an honour and love as Billroth. This was unmistakably shown when he was so ill in the beginning of 1887. From the earliest morning to late at night crowds surrounded his house for news. Every newspaper published twice daily a bulletin on the state of his health, which was eagerly looked for. For many days Billroth was looked upon as a lost man. I became enraged when people came out with the expression, 'What a loss for science!' What does science trouble me? It can look after itself. Even better physicians may appear. But the man Billroth! As a man, even without his medical art and science, he can never have his equal; such a one can never appear again. Fortunately what was feared did not happen. Billroth was saved by his energetic nature and by splendid nursing. Vienna overflowed with announcement of the most joyous feelings of thankfulness. Billroth soon took up his labours with double zest. Years have not lessened his strength, nor disturbed his spirit, nor weakened his sensibility for all that is beautiful and great; they have only made him gentler and more amiable." How sad to think that before these lines appeared in print their subject was no more!

FINE ARTS

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.

(Fifth Notice.—Dutch Pictures.)

ALTHOUGH as numerous as usual, the contents of Gallery II. are not, as a whole, nearly up to the high standard of former years. However, two rarities, an Ochterveldt and a Vermeer (Jacob, not Jan as the Catalogue has it), although neither of them is a first-rate specimen of the master it represents, impart a peculiar interest to the collection, and may serve to fix the gathering in the memory of the connoisseur.

We begin with the figure pictures, and this brings to the front Mr. Joseph's Ochterveldt just mentioned, a Metau-like interior called A Singing Practice (No. 50). The party consists of a lady, wearing the white dress the artist was so fond of, and standing at a spinet; another lady, in whose dress appears the peculiar pure cherry red he was also partial to, holding a music-book; and other persons behind. The chiaroscuro and colour, the harmony and brilliancy of the light, the crispness and firmness of the touch, and the exquisite pencilling (which we prefer even to Metau's) of the satin skirts of both ladies, combined as they are with the stereoscopic solidity of the whole work, are worthy of the closest attention, although the picture is not free from the hardness which characterizes all the Ochterveldts that we have seen. So rare are Ochterveldt's works that they were quite unknown at the British Institution, and only three have been exhibited at the Academy. The best of these is Capt. Hankey's 'Joyful Tidings,' which was No. 84 in this room in 1885. 'A Girl playing on a Harpsichord,' which was No. 74 here in 1872, was not superior to Mr. Joseph's picture. Mr. John Walter has a very good one of 'A Girl tickling a Sleeping Cavalier with a Feather,' which was at Manchester in 1857. He may like to refer to Smith's description of his picture under 'Terburg,' No. 43. There is a capital Ochterveldt at Dresden, numbered 1681. Ochterveldt generally dated his pictures; the undated here, doubtless, been allotted to his master Metau; some, perhaps, bear the name of Mieris, or even that of De Hooghe.

Naturally enough, D. Teniers II. is as frequently represented at the Academy as Ochterveldt is rarely. Interior of a Guard-room (52), which Mr. Wertheimer has lent, is a moderately good Teniers, no doubt by the man under whose name all the so-called Tenierses pass, as "D. Teniers F." is written on a box in the front. Many of its elements resemble Smith's No. 435, said to be at the museum at Lyons, in which, as in other Tenierses, the group of St. Peter delivered from prison, here placed in the background, likewise occurs. The painter's satiric temper expressed itself in this quaint and, to all appearance, whimsically chosen incident; at least three examples of it are known. A very similar design occurs at Knowsley as No. 38 in Mr. Scharf's catalogue, and we described it in "The Private Collections of England"; another, still more like that before us, but painted on copper, is, or was, at Knoke. Yet another was not long since at the Academy. There is one—without the angel or St. Peter, and smaller than No. 52—at Dresden; and Smith's 433, containing the apostle and his deliverer, was sold in 1815, and, as it fetched 330 guineas, it must have been a good one. The Lyons picture is most of all like Mr. Wertheimer's.

Next to the single Teniers of the year hangs Terburg's Smoker (53), a three-quarters-length figure of a man in a black jacket and cap, lighting his pipe at a chafing-dish—a fine broad study, rather warmer than usual, but marked by an exceptional brownness, and a first-rate illustration of the master's method of arranging masses of tone and strong tints of no great brightness. Otherwise it does not remind us of Terburg, nor is it mentioned in the catalogues. A much more important example is Jan Steen's Saying Grace (58), which is signed and dated 1660, a valuable member of Mr. C. Morrison's collection. It was No. 54 here in 1879, and is Smith's No. 185. Smith says it was imported by Mr. Chaplin in 1831. A much larger picture, with more figures, of the same subject, was lent to the Academy (as No. 69) in 1889 by the Duke of Rutland; and Col. Fitzgibbon exhibited at the British Institution No. 26, a smaller picture of 'A Boy saying Grace.' No such picture as this is mentioned in the copious catalogue of Heer T. van Westrheene, 1856. Nevertheless it belongs to Steen's best time, it is unusually pure and limpid, almost as warm, soft, and harmonious as a De Hooghe, and especially acceptable on account of the nuances of the faces, the richness of the colouring, and the simplicity of the design. The child lies in the matron's lap, and is made distinct in the cool silvery light reflected on its figure. The verses in Dutch written on the tablet are a free adaptation of Proverbs xxx. 8. Among the noteworthy elements of the design are the table implements, the bell in the frame overhead, the articles hanging on the walls, and the dresses of the family. The next Jan Steen comes from Buckingham Palace. It is well known as The Violin (84), and, under the title 'Music and Gaming,' is Smith's No. 86. That writer, following popular tradition, as he was apt to do, declares that the "jovial fellow" who is playing on the violin is Steen himself. Such a face as this may possibly represent Steen's idea of his own looks, but no accepted portrait of him justifies the opinion. Heer van Westrheene, a great authority on the artist, gave the name 'Une Compagnie joyeuse,' and the number 55 to this work in his catalogue, and repeated what Smith said about the likeness. Mrs. Jameson said the same thing, while she added that the picture is "very harmonious in the composition," which is a phrase we fail to understand. Perhaps it really meant nothing in particular; but probably it is a confused version of Sir Joshua's dictum that "Steen has shown the greatest skill in composition and management of light and shadow." Nagler and Waagen admired it, and Smith added that his number 88 was sold at Amsterdam in 1762, with the collection of M. Wierman, for 471., sold again in 1809 for 1300., and finally for 145 guineas by Michael Bryan, probably to the Prince Regent, who was then forming the Carlton House Gallery, which is now included in the private collection of Her Majesty. With the Carlton House pictures it was at the British Institution in 1826 and 1827, under the title of 'A Dutch Merry-Making.' Heer van Westrheene challenged Smith's identification of the 'Compagnie joyeuse' with the picture sold at the Wierman sale, and he quoted prices very different from the above. It contains eleven figures, executed in what Reynolds called the "strong, manly style of painting, which might even become the design of Raphaelle." The brown tone which many critics have remarked is more predominant than usual in Steens; equally unfrequent are the lightness, firmness, and crispness of the touch, while nothing can surpass the animation, truth, and variety of the figures and faces. The figure of the woman in the blue dress, at whom the musician is looking, is most lifelike. The intense naturalism of the whole work is worthy of Steen's best time, and highly characteristic of his prodigious individuality. The details of this picture are, like those of No. 58, worth studying: the bell frame like a birdcage hanging over the table, the implements on the table, the crockery on the walls and floor, and that assembly of odds and ends with which Dutch farm kitchens were then and are still crowded. The Dutch Family Merry-Making (87), lent by the Corporation of Glasgow, is not to be compared with the Queen's picture. We need only mention, in order to call attention to them, the other Steens in this gallery: they are Mr. Joseph's luminous and spirited Glass of Wine (88), which is rich in character; and Mr. Montagu's Interior with Figures (84).

Eeckhout's Portrait of a Man (64) is so representative of that accomplished pupil of Rembrandt that it may be used as a sort of touchstone for distinguishing his works from Rembrandt's. There is but the semblance of vigour in the rendering of this man's face; his eyes, unlike those of a Rembrandt portrait, have no speculation in them, nor any thought, so to say, behind them; there is little more than acquired habit or the trick of a school in the touch of the brush before us, while, the conventions of Rembrandt's workshop apart, the style of this picture is flat and weak. A characteristic yellowness, quite different from the yellowness of Bol and Dou, prevails, and suffices to convince the connoisseur at the first glance that the work is by Eeckhout. Most characteristic are the emptiness of the forms and a certain vagueness which bespeaks a facile but rather nerveless hand. Arent de Gelder, whose work is seldom seen here, was responsible for Bathsheba asking King David to appoint Solomon his Successor (66), of which it may be said that, while it has some merits, its best use now is to illustrate the difference between the powers of a pupil of Rembrandt and those of Rembrandt himself—a difference which was distinctly due to the want of insight and strength in the younger man. Microvolt's Portrait of a Lady (69) is not a first-rate example. The face is rather weakly executed, hard, and mechanical, and is only interesting as the work of a noteworthy artist, but it may have been rubbed.

Mr. Walter's Garden Scene (80) is a first-rate De Hooghe, and is a wonderfully charming illustration of the quaint beauty and restfulness of Dutch life during the later half of the seventeenth century, when, after terrible troubles and sacrifices, the freedom of the nation was secured. The place is a garden in front of a pavilion of sun-eaten brick, such as Pieter loved to paint in all its depth of redness, with its overlying lichens and trails of many coloured mosses that had ripened to seed during the summer, which has just given way to that autumnal glow that gives splendour to the flowers, and deeper hues to the grass and the finely massed foliage of the mid-distance. The cavaliers and ladies in their stiff but sumptuously coloured attire are the grandchildren of those who fought Alva and Requesens; their fiercest combats at home are confined to the game of ninepins which absorb the chief figures who are not, like the lady and gentleman in the foreground, flirting in the Dutch manner. Technically speaking, the wise and brilliant master here proves himself to be what the half-taught and half-idle Impressionists of the present hour pretend to be, that is, an accomplished delineator of an effect of colour, light, and tone, combining the tonality and coloration of his subject so as to achieve perfect chiaroscuro. In doing this the painter did not save himself trouble by slurring the details. On the contrary, he has reproduced with the utmost care and subtlety of eye and judgment the warm autumnal light, so limpid and yet soft and rich, which pervades the place; he has delineated the ladies and gentlemen of his time with the choicest skill, and with exquisite craft painted the flowers they loved. With all this the master has forfeited nothing of breadth and harmony in his picture nor omitted the sparkle of the foreground blossoms, nor the silhouette-like masses of the shadowy trees which stand flat, so to say, against the sky. This picture appears to be Smith's No. 59, which was sold in 1832, with the collection of Mr. G. Morant, for 210 guineas; it would now fetch at least ten times as much. Under No. 58 Smith describes another very similar and somewhat larger De Hooghe, which was sold in 1829, with the Thomas Emmerson Collection, for 170 guineas. Dr. Waagen, describing this picture, 'Galleries,' 1857, p. 294, objected to the "verdure [q.v. foliage] as somewhat too heavy, by which the keeping is rather disturbed." We suspect that the otherwise sympathetic critic misunderstood the painter's aim. The compilers of the Academy Catalogue, who give "c. 1632" as the date of De Hooghe's birth, will read with pleasure and profit the brilliant essay on 'Pieter de Hooch' in M. H. Havard's 'L'Art et les Artistes Hollandais,' iii. 63; and from M. Van der Willigen's 'Les Artistes de Harlem,' 1870, p. 180, they will learn that there is no need for the doubt about the date of his death implied by their "c. 1681." The Dutch antiquary discovered that on the 28th of February, 1681, a demand was made for the opening of a grave for "Pieter de Hoogo" in the choir of St. Bavo at Harlem, where his wife had been buried on the 11th of September, 1680. Mr. Edward Denny exhibited at the British Institution in 1841 'A Garden Scene' by De Hooghe, probably that before us, which was certainly No. 77 at that gallery in 1861.

In Lord Amherst's Portrait of a Burgomaster (81) we have a good, but not extraordinary F. Hals. The same owner has lent another Hals, full of spirit and vigorously painted, but somewhat more heavily touched than usual, called Portrait of a Young Man (86), which is especially interesting because it is inscribed "Atatis sue 26," and, a somewhat rare circumstance, dated "An" 1636, that is, when Hals was fifty-two years of age, the year before he completed the renowned 'Archers' Guild' in the Town Hall at Amsterdam. Although neither of these portraits equals the Queen's Hals, which was here some time ago, or Lady Wallace's 'Cavalier,' still less the great Hals at Brunswick, they illustrate the marvellous forthright touch of the master, who put his mosaic-like tints (which most painters find the most difficult to harmonize) side by side with utmost precision and with wonderful certainty that they would be right. Apart from this, let us say that we have seen portraits by Verspruick, Hals's follower, which are nearly as good as these, and not unlike them.

Mr. Iouden's Brauer (90) represents an Interior in the painter's best manner. As is sometimes the case, it suggests the mood and technique of Tintoret. Extremely interesting and attractive, but not pre-eminent among Ver Meers, is the Lady at a Spinnet (93), probably the picture formerly in the Pommersfelden Collection, and at one time, together with the Ver Meer with a similar title lately acquired for the National Gallery, in the hands of M. Burger (Thore). That before us, though it has high merits of its own, is not the better of the two. The disproportions (always to be observed in this painter's curiously incomplete works) of the rather clumsy maiden who sits at her instrument are obvious, and the violoncello at her side is also quite out of scale. These and cognate defects, such as the "sharp" perspective of the frame and bars of the window, and the spinnet itself, indicate that "der Delftsche Ver Meer" worked in a very small atelier, and did not possess sufficient knowledge of perspective, or was too careless to correct the errors that circumstance imposed on an unscientific workman. The colouring is heavier than in most Ver Meers that we have seen, the darker tones are less limpid than usual, and the coloration at large is somewhat heavy, not to say crude. But the genuineness of the picture is unquestionable. The tones are strong, and like nature; the lighting approaches that of a moderately good De Hooghe; and in the mask-like face of the lady, her inanimate air, the colour and quality of her blue gown, as well as in the dark landscape which hangs on the wall behind the figure, and the peculiar position of the window, we have elements found nowhere else than in the works of Ver Meer. Almost invariably he depicted a framed picture on the wall of the room he chose to paint. They differ in character so much that we have been led to imagine Ver Meer had a deliberate intention in each case; if so, the gloomy landscape on the wall behind the "lady at the spinnet" may be associated with her fortunes, much as the rocco Cupid painted behind the damsel in the example at the National Gallery may indicate the power who ruled her life. No. 93 has been engraved for the Gazette des Beaux-Arts. A noteworthy picture by a comparatively rare artist is Pieter Codde's Dutch Interior (97), whose peculiarities it thoroughly well illustrates—the grouping in varied views of the figures severally, which together form a circle, their animated expressions and attitudes, the stereoscopic solidity and finish of the work as a whole, and its prevailing greyness. In the last-named quality, as, in a less degree, in the others, we must needs associate him with Le Duc, although Anthony Palamedes is, so to say, Codde's artistic analogue. This circumstance struck M. H. Havard, who compared the charming 'Danceurs,' by Codde, which belonged to M. Wilson, with 'Le Concert' of A. Palamedes, then in the De Jonge Collection at the Hague. It would have been instructive to have seen together here Mr. Broadwood's fine Le Duc called 'Regret for the Violoncello Player,' No. 77 of 1892, and the charming Pieter Codde which is before us.

The Dutch landscapes, architecture, and pieces of still life need not detain us long, because, although their merits are considerable, they are not above the average, nor do they depart widely from the well-recognized types of the masters who painted them. Adrian Van de Velde's Landscape with Cattle (48), dated 1654, must consequently be due to his nineteenth year, for there is no doubt he was twenty-one, April 5th, 1657, when he was married. It speaks volumes for his skill in composition, and, though it has suffered from time or varnish, is bright and pure in colour. The laboured touch betrays the timidity of the painter, and has imparted to his work something like the hardness and polish of porcelain. The low horizon and blue sky attest the early fondness of the painter for those frequent elements in his pictures. Cuyt's Landscape, Morning (56), excels in breadth, silveriness, and harmony of all sorts. It is a fine example no one ought to overlook. It appears to be Smith's No. 138, and Supplementary No. 47. He does not mention the signature "A. Cuyt," and the dimensions he quotes are not quite the same as those of the Academy Catalogue. He records that it was bought in at Mr. J. Knight's sale in 1819 at 940 guineas, and again bought in, at 900 guineas, in 1821; in 1840 it was sold to Mr. Arteria (a dealer) for 950 guineas; and in 1842 it belonged to the now dispersed Saltmarsh Collection. It is in a fine condition. Lady Wallace's Still Life (61), by De Heem, is a masterpiece, larger and colder than usual. Ruysdael's Town of Katwijk (73) is remarkable for a finely painted sky and a silvery sea in the distance. His charming Windmill (76) reminds us of Van der Neer's silvery evening effects, and, like them, is noteworthy for expressing the beautiful sentiment of the time and scene. It is signed. The Spanish costumes of the women in P. Neefs's Interior of a Church (77) indicate that the church is at Antwerp; the slabs in the floor, the firm, crisp pencilling, and the solidity of the picture are noteworthy. Calm (79) is a good W. Van de Velde, but, though instinct with the serene poetry of evening, it is rather cold. The delicate draughtsmanship of the rigging of the ships is such as we expect from the artist. The Landscape (82) of Hobbema is powerful and characteristic.

In our next article we shall deal with the Italianized Flemings—Rubens, Van Dyck, and others.

NOTES FROM NUBIA.

Abou Simbel, Nubia, Jan. 20, 1894.

It may interest your readers to hear what we have been able to verify, or find for ourselves, in our journey up the Nile from the first to the second cataract. The number of scientific travellers who have reported upon Nubia is but small, Gau's inscriptions being the main authority for the Nubian collection in the 'C. I. G.', and Lepsius having given his main attention to hieroglyphics. What I have found in the way of papyri at Alexandria and Cairo cannot be announced till I have returned to Egypt and re-examined them.

As regards Nubia, the chief points of historical interest are three: What amount of influence had the early Egyptian dynasties over this remote country? what did the Ptolemies effect in the way of civilizing it? what evidence is there for the existence of independent native princes? On all three points we have found considerable additional evidence. Taking the temples in their order from north to south, we find at Debôt that the inner naos was built by a native Nubian king Atkheramon, while the pronaos and pylons in front of it (and therefore subsequent) were commenced by Euergetes II., so that the native prince must come into the disturbed period at the end of Ptolemy IV., and during the infancy of Ptolemy V. The Rosetta inscription speaks as if the fifth Ptolemy had recovered all his father's dominions; the constant recurrence of Euergetes II. (and no earlier of the series) on Nubian temples seems to tell us that this was the king during whose long reign the southern provinces were recovered for Egypt. Roman emperors from Augustus onward have left ample records of their sway.

The few late and uninteresting votive inscriptions at Gâtass are all round a small shrine in the centre of the great sandstone quarries, from which the temples of Philæ were chiefly built. At Tehfa we could find no inscriptions, but behind this, and indeed behind all such settlements in Nubia, we found the necropolis, generally tombs in the sand marked by stone circles, and in every case rifled and worried by the modern natives in search of schlich, a kind of saltpetre stuff, which they use for top dressing on their fields.

The next place, Kalapshé (Talmis of the Romans), has all the walls of the great pronaos covered with inscriptions. Mr. Sayce counted over eighty of them (fifty-six are given in the 'Corpus'), and we succeeded, with the aid of a ladder, in copying a metrical one which has probably not yet been published. Most of them are painted on the stone with red paint, which comes out very clearly when touched with spirits of wine. The well-known inscription of Silko, king of the Nubians and Blemmyes, we recopied, for the sake of verifying the editions of it; the Merotic (?) text close beside it was copied by Mr. Sayce.

There did not seem to us any evidence in the inscription that Silko was a Christian. The order concerning the keeping of pigs out of the sacred enclosure is still there and quite legible, and sounds very like the orders of the Dublin Corporation on the same point in the seventeenth century.

High up above Kalapshé is the rock temple of Bet-el-Walli, set up by Ramses II., and showing both the merits and the defects of his work; the pictures of his conquests over the tribes of Ethiopia are, however, very interesting, and important for this southern history.

At Deudâr, a temple containing cartouches of Roman emperors misapplied ('Autokrator' for Autokrator several times), we copied a Coptic inscription on the east post of the south door, which speaks of Theodoros as 'Bishop of Philæ,' a title disputed in the guide-books. He was the bishop who abolished heathenism at Philæ about 577 A.D.

At Dakkeh (Pselchis of the Romans) we found the inscriptions very much effaced by the weathering which blowing sand produces even more than rain; but many of the votive texts of Roman officers are still to be read. It is remarkable that while that of Apollonius calls him a strategos, one immediately beneath speaks of him as the afore-mentioned Arabarches, a word known in the late Republican days of Rome for native Syrian princes. Several of the devout call themselves generals, but we look in vain for the most distinguished of them, Petronius, though that name is scratched three times, apparently at random, in the temple of Gâtass.

Everywhere we found the natives very friendly, though very noisy inside the temples, when we were dictating inscriptions, which are often best taken by one reading out while the other writes, and then verifying by reversing the operation. In each village there was a gaffir or policeman, distinguished by a double-barrelled gun (often flint-lock) and a Soudanese spear or sword, who attended us. The women were very shy, and difficult to inspect. Their chief peculiarities of costume (besides the absence of clothes) were a broad gold ring fixed in the right nostril so as to stand out sideways, the plaiting of the hair into a vast number of small cords, and an earring set in the top of the ear. But all the natives, both men and women, cast their rags about them with a truly Hellenic grace; and the men might fairly be called clean, though the little boys had a curious grey bloom of dust all over their dark skins. But I must postpone anthropology for the present.

The next place of interest was the rock temple of Gerf Hussein, also a work of Ramses II., who seems to have built a large number of small imitations of the vast masterpiece at Abou Simbel. The scenery is very barren all through Lower Nubia, often a mere strip of five or six yards along the river; then comes the fine defile of El-Bab, which is almost a cataract, and exciting for boats which do not command steam. When we approach Korosko, and for many miles into Southern Nubia, the prospect is widely different; there is large cultivation, and much remains untill for want of larger population. I will reserve more important novelties for another letter. J. P. MARAFFY.

NOTES FROM ITALY.

Two archaeological discoveries of the first order have resulted from the excavations made during the last few months. The first is that of a very ancient stele, which, together with some figured representations, bears a well-preserved inscription of twelve lines in Italic characters. It came to light in excavating the necropolis of Novilara, near Pesaro, namely, in that same territory where have been obtained in past times other figured stelæ of a very peculiar character. One of these latter, most resembling our present one, was made an object of study some ten years ago by Prof. Undset, who recognized in the ornamentation a distinct Mycæan character, and explained its presence there by means of the commercial and other relations between the East and the Italian coasts of the Adriatic. The new stele has been brought to Rome and placed provisionally in a private room of the new museum at Diocletian's Baths, until Prof. Lattes, of Milan, has published his illustrations of the object and the result of his studies thereon. The stele is eighty centimètres high, and is worked on both faces. On the top of the front face is carved a wheel of four spokes, and beneath it is a scene of combat between men and animals divided into two compartments. One portion displays various combatants armed with lances, and one armed with an axe, and near them are men and reptiles lying on the ground. In the other portion are to be seen two men, delineated in a very primitive fashion, one fighting with a bull, and the other with a bear. On the left, by the side of one of the combatants, stands a pyramid. The other face of the stele is also surmounted by a wheel, but of five instead of four spokes, underneath which are twelve lines of writing, clearly engraved and very legible. On the left of the inscription is a pyramid, and on the right a cross, while all round runs a border consisting of two wavy lines. The text, which was at first thought by some to be Sabellian, and by others Illyrian, appears now to be recognized by Prof. Lattes as Etruscan.

The other discovery was made in the village of Castel Trosino, about six kilometres from Ascoli Piceno, and belongs to the time of the barbarians. In digging on some land belonging to the parish church of the village some tombs came accidentally to light, the contents of which soon began to attract the attention of the neighbours. On being informed of the occurrence, the Minister of Public Instruction ordered a regular exploration of the place to be undertaken under the direction of Prof. Brizio, of the University of Bologna. The result of his researches has been really splendid, and when fully made known to the public will awaken the greatest interest. The tombs, of which about 150 have been already explored, belong to a post-Roman necropolis, and their contents far surpass in abundance and richness all similar discoveries hitherto made on Italian soil. They consist for the most part of gold and silver ornaments, such as crosses (some of which bear inscriptions), brooches, clasps, circular and broad-headed nails, sheaths for knives and daggers, necklaces formed of mounted Byzantine coins, &c. To these must be added arms, fragments of breastplates and other armour, and an important series of fine articles in glass. The style of the whole of this hoard is distinctly Lombardic; small crosses in gold were worn sewn on the dress at that period among that warrior people. But the position of Castel Trosino corresponds to no Lombard duchy known to us, and the study of these precious remains, which have been brought to Rome and placed in the new museum of the Villa di Papa Giulio, may result in throwing light not only on the history of barbaric art, but also on that of the settlements of the Lombards in the peninsula. Another small necropolis belonging to the same period, but of lesser importance, has been discovered near Borgo Masino, in the province of Turin. Here also, together with swords, lances, bits and horse trappings in bronze, were collected gold crosses, and earrings embellished with filigree work of Lombardic style.

SALES.

pedestal, 94l. 10s. Rosette (sic), of Rome, The Greek Slave, life size, on obonized pedestal, 75l. H. Weekes, The Young Naturalist, on square scagliola pedestal, 99l. Canova, Venus, 157l. B. E. Spence, Venus and Cupid, 315l. J. W. Swynnerton, Love's Chalice, a group of lovers at a fountain, on sculptured pedestal, 168l. W. Storey, Medea, a statue rather larger than life size, on a square revolving marble pedestal, 210l. Anonymous, A Campana-shaped Vase, 57l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 12th and 13th inst. the following. Engravings after G. Morland: The Story of Letitia, by J. R. Smith (the set of six), 30l.; The Deserter, by G. Keating (a set of four), 30l.; The Angler's Repast, and A Party Angling, by W. Ward and G. Keating, 25l.; Fox-Hunting: Going Out, Going into Cover, The Check, The Death, by E. Bell (a set of four), 52l.; The First of September: Morning and Evening (a pair), by W. Ward, 31l. Prints: A. Dürer, Melancholy (B. 74), 33l.; The Knight and Death (B. 98), 30l. F. Muller, The Madonna di San Sisto, after Raffaele, 65l.

Five-3rd Society.

THE general meeting of the Society for Preserving the Monuments of Ancient Egypt will be held in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, on the 23rd inst., at 3 p.m. The question of the reservoir at Assouan, which will involve the submergence of the island and temples at Philæ, will be brought before the meeting. The reader will hardly believe that this age has become barbarous enough for such a question to be set forth, much less discussed. Nevertheless such is the case, and lovers of antiquity and art had need be heedful of the matter, lest the question grow into a fact. The stupid devastation of Kirkstall can hardly—except that it was wanton, pedantic, and needless—be compared with the ruin of Philæ and its temples.

THE second general meeting of the Hellenic Society for the season 1893-4 will be held at 22, Albemarle Street on Monday next at 5 p.m., when Mr. H. Stuart Jones, Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, will read a paper on 'A Reconstruction of the Chest of Cypellus.'

At the general meeting of the Society of Painters in Water Colours on Thursday, the 8th inst., Messrs. Hubert Herkomer, R.A., Ernest A. Waterlow, A.R.A., and Lionel Smythe were elected Members, and Mr. J. R. Weguelin an Associate.

SOME of the French journals announce that Sir E. Burne-Jones has not only been made a "baronnet," but "un pair d'Angleterre," and that Mr. Watts, to whom the same honours were offered, refused them. Many of our readers do not know that about the time of Mr. Watts's former refusal another most distinguished Academician declined a baronetcy, although he is possessed of ample means, and sons to boot.

F. MADOX BROWN's picture 'Christ washing Peter's Feet,' which we recently described, has been placed in the gallery of the left staircase (leading to the British paintings) of the National Gallery, and numbered 1394. In Room XX. of the same building, with the number 1398, there now hangs the life-size, half-length picture by Sir C. Eastlake entitled 'Ippolita Torelli,' and representing her seated in a chair, which is mounted in chased brass, and of which only one arm is visible; her head is turned in three-quarters view to our right, and rests on her right hand, the elbow of which is supported by the arm of the chair; her left hand holds a string of pearls. The fair and youthful face is modelled with all Sir Charles's care and refinement, in a soft, luminous, almost shadowless effect, after his wont; the uniformly delicate rosinous of the carnations is such as Eastlake adopted for similar studies, and it harmonizes with the red velvet robe, which has a pink satin lining, and the white Italian turban. The light, richly varied background is appropriate to the coloration of the figure, and such as we expect to have from the painter. It is a bequest from Lady Eastlake, and was No. 135 at the Academy in 1851. The catalogue gave a reference to Castiglione's 'Poemata.'

THE Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities at the British Museum has of late years added greatly to its collection of strictly Athenian vases, and it has recently been especially fortunate in buying some of the choicest specimens of the beautiful and refined sort, the bodies of which are painted in red and other colours on light grounds, while the necks and feet are black. Of these none is more delightful than an Athenian lecythus, now in a case in the Vase Gallery, about fifteen inches high, dating from c. 420 B.C., and comprising a most curious representation of a lofty earthen tumulus surmounted by a tall stèle, round which are tied fillets of red and yellow ribbons—the colours being still distinct—while larger and broader fillets, similarly coloured, are laid upon the tumulus itself. It is especially noteworthy that, as if the mound were transparent, five funeral vases of various forms are depicted standing on the floor of the chamber within. At each side of the mound stands a tall and stately youth, or mourner, who has come to visit the consecrated spot; one of them holds a lyre on which he is playing, and his companion has in his hands what appears to be a broad red fillet, intended, doubtless, for the decoration of the monument. Our readers will remember that some time ago we described a vase, then lately bought by the British Museum, which depicts the interior of a tumulus, and the corpse squatting on the floor, which is carefully paved with large water-worn pebbles. Another lecythus—found in the same tomb with that of the mourners, and of about the same date and dimensions, but not quite so fine in style—deserves mention here because its body bears on one side a drawing, in fine outlines and partly coloured, of a very lofty stèle, and on each side of it is depicted a youth standing erect with a reverential air, while close to the youth on our left of the stèle lies a minute human figure, evidently intended for the soul of the deceased, as if returning from the shades to the tomb. A third lecythus, which came from the same site, and is of about the same date, is decorated in fine red lines with an admirably drawn and very spirited dance of youths and maidens. In the same case the visitor will find a fragment of a similar lecythus, which—a rare circumstance—is inscribed HTIAINON KAAOE, which is identical with the writing on another vessel of the same kind already in the Museum. The fragment is an addition, and so is yet another lecythus on which are delineated Orestes and Electra in a group, and with their names written beside the figures. This circumstance affirms the correctness of the traditional habit of the older archaeologists, who to similar groups, which are not infrequent, applied the names of these personages. The confirmation is the more valuable because some young scholars have denied the names to the groups in question, and asserted that there was no authority for their application.

THE Ninth Report of the Egyptian Commission for the Preservation of the Monuments of Arab Art has reached us, and shows that a large amount of useful work was accomplished in 1892-3. The Commission appear to be spending the small grant of 4,000l. a year allotted to them by the Khedive's Government to the best advantage, and besides innumerable small repairs and proppings, by which many priceless monuments have been saved from ruin, they have undertaken large restorations at such mosques as Ibn-Tulun, El-Mo'ayyad, and Senjar El-Gawaly. We notice that they are working in excellent harmony with the Department of Religious Trusts (Wakf), which contributes considerably to the cost of the repairs, and even with the Board of Works—the natural enemy of ancient monuments, but at Cairo now apparently the ally of the Commission. Among other things the Works Department is clearing away the numerous shops which disfigure the façades of the mosques. This involves some loss of the picturesque, but an undoubted gain both to architecture and safety. The Cairene builder and householder are now kept in pretty good order; they cannot alter, pull down, or build to, an art monument without the leave of the Commission. Altogether this useful and intelligent body seem to be doing their best to keep the beautiful buildings of Cairo standing as long as their inherent perishableness will permit.

THE Fine-Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for a private view of "Drawings, Political and Social," by Mr. H. Furniss. The public will be admitted to the exhibition on Monday next.

A NEW work by Rembrandt, which Sir F. Burton bought at Lady Eastlake's sale, has been hung in the National Gallery.

THE exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy opens at Edinburgh this (Saturday) morning. Out of 1,400 works sent in 500 have been hung.

A PORTION of the line of the Antonine Wall has been destroyed where it is best preserved by the erection of a villa near Falkirk, the foundations of which are laid over the fosse. It seems that before this was done General Pitt Rivers remonstrated with the owner of the ground, Mr. Forbes of Callendar, but that gentleman declined to enter into correspondence with the General; nor has he taken any notice of a remonstrance addressed to him by the Glasgow Archaeological Society. He enjoys the unique distinction of being, as General Pitt Rivers says, the only owner who, since the Act of 1882, has "been found unwilling to take any steps for the protection of a monument on his property." Both the English and Scottish Societies of Antiquaries have expressed their regret at the destruction of the wall, which there is reason to fear may be continued.

A DUTCH correspondent tells us that an exhibition has been opened at Amsterdam of the book illustrations of Mr. Walter Crane, the late Mr. Caldecott, Miss Kate Greenaway, Mr. Thomson, Mr. Ford, and M. Boutet de Monvel. The prints have been mounted on toned paper.

THE German archaeological mission at Athens claims to have discovered in the bed of Lake Copais the ruins of a town more important than Mycenæ.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Popular Concerts.
PRINCE'S HALL.—Mr. Gompertz's Concert.

ON Saturday afternoon last at the Popular Concert, Mlle. Eibenschütz repeated the five examples from the new set of ten pianoforte pieces by Brahms, Op. 118 and 119, which she introduced on a previous occasion, and played for the first time the Intermezzo in a flat minor from Op. 118. This piece, though small in dimensions, is singularly characteristic of Brahms in his loftiest mood, and, as the programme annotator well observes, contains enough of the essence of music for a symphonic movement, and, moreover, is pervaded by a certain gloomy grandeur and an air of mystery. Mlle. Eibenschütz again played very finely, and the crowded audience would not be content until she accorded an encore, her choice being the piquant and tuneful Inter- mezzo in C. Herr Joachim's undiminished powers were again exhibited in their fullest measure in Schumann's Fantasia in A minor, Op. 131, which the master composed expressly for him in 1853. It is well that the Hungarian violinist should present the work from time to time, if only as a token of respect; but it can scarcely ever become popular, as it was penned at a period when Schumann's mental powers had commenced to decay, and, in spite of occasional beautiful thoughts, is on the whole dull and laboured. The concerted works in this programme were Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 74, and the same composer's Pianoforte Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3. The pleasing light soprano voice of Miss Alice Eety was displayed to advantage in songs by Grieg and Massenet.

Monday's performance may be briefly dismissed. The concerted works were Mendelssohn's Quartet in D, Op. 44, No. 1, and Mozart's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin (Köchel's Catalogue, No. 377). The notes in the book with regard to the latter should be revised. The statement that only nineteen piano and violin sonatas of Mozart are published was true when it was written many years ago, probably by the late J. W. Davison, but it is, of course, absurd at the present time, when every available note penned by the Salzburg master is in print. Mr. Leonard Borwick repeated his masterly interpretation of Schumann's Fantasiestücke, Op. 12, and firmly declined an encore; but Herr Joachim was more amenable after as fine a rendering of Bach's Chaconne as any he has given us for many years. The vocalist was Mr. David Diapham, who was excellent in two songs by Marcello, and even more praiseworthy in Loewe's splendid ballad 'Archibald Douglas.' Better declamatory singing could not be desired.

The second chamber concert of Mr. Richard Gompertz, on Tuesday evening, was noteworthy for the first performance in London of a new Quartet in A minor by Prof. Villiers Stanford. The first movement, molto moderato, alternating with più moto, suggests the influence of Beethoven, at any rate in the slow portion. The next, marked prestissimo, is brief, crisp, and brilliant; and the third, andante espressivo, is interesting, and contains a highly dramatic episode. The brisk finale is worthy of association with the previous movements, and the quartet, capably played as it was by the concert-giver and Messrs. Inwards, Kreuz, and Ould, made a distinctly favourable impression, and should be heard again at the earliest opportunity. Good performances were also given of Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 131, and Brahms's Piano and Violin Sonata in A, Op. 78, Madame Alma Haas being the pianist. Songs by Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, and Mr. Arthur Somervell were, of course, artistically rendered by Mr. W. Shakespeare.

HERR HANS VON BÜLOW.

We have made such frequent reference of late to the ill-health of this gifted musician that the news of his death, which took place at Cairo on Tuesday, scarcely came as a surprise. Few workers in his profession have laboured more zealously and unremittingly than Hans von Bülow, and his departure is certainly a loss to the art, though at the age of sixty-four—he was born at Dresden on January 8th, 1830—it can scarcely be regarded as premature. Intended by his father for jurisprudence, he took pianoforte lessons from Friedrich Wieck, the father of Madame Schumann, simply at first as an amateur; but music soon claimed him altogether. He was present at the memorable production of 'Lohengrin' under Liszt at Weimar in 1850, and forthwith became one of Wagner's most ardent admirers. During the next years he chiefly devoted himself to the pianoforte as executant and teacher, but in 1864 he became conductor of the Hoftheater at Munich, and here Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' and 'Die Meistersinger' were produced under his direction. Then came the divorce from his wife, Frau Cosima, Liszt's daughter, and her union with Wagner. He quickly married again, and more happily; and so far from showing ill-will towards the master, who was then maturing his Bayreuth schemes, he espoused his cause more enthusiastically than before. In the month of May, 1873, he paid his first visit to this country, and caused not a little flutter alike by his profoundly intellectual pianoforte playing and his spirited conducting. It was just at the period when head-way was beginning to be made against the clique which dominated musical criticism in London, and had hitherto practically excluded such masters as Schumann, Wagner, and Brahms. Hans von Bülow did very much towards the destruction of the walls of prejudice, and English amateurs should hold him in grateful remembrance. He came again from time to time, his last visit being in 1888, when he gave a remarkably interesting series of Beethoven recitals, which were not so much appreciated as they should have been. Von Bülow's readings of the Bonn master's sonatas were almost without parallel for depth of thought, and if he did play false notes occasionally, forgiveness was easily accorded owing to the eloquence of his phrasing and the general insight into the composer's meaning which he invariably evinced. Though as a composer he did not display much originality, his editions of pianoforte classics are invaluable, and the Von Bülow fingering is frequently quoted as making easy passages before regarded as well-nigh impossible. Irascible in temperament, he possessed an inexhaustible fund of humour, and his witty remarks would fill a volume.

Musical Society.

THE next festival at Chester is fixed for July 25th, 26th, and 27th. The programme will include two new works, namely, a Symphony in F, by Dr. J. C. Bridge, and a cantata, 'The Soul's Forgiveness,' by Dr. Sawyer; also 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' Dr. Hubert Parry's 'Judith,' Cherubini's Mass in D, Verdi's 'Requiem,' Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' and Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang.'

THERE is no diminution whatever in the popularity of Wagner's music in the concert-room, the London Symphony Concert on Thursday last week attracting such a crowd of amateurs to St. James's Hall that it was promptly decided to repeat the performance at the Queen's Hall on April 11th. And yet there were neither vocal nor instrumental soloists, Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony—as usual, associated with the 'In Memoriam' concert which is now given regularly as near as possible to the anniversary of the Bayreuth master's death—being placed between the prelude and the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal' on the one hand, and the prelude and close from 'Tristan und Isolde' and the 'Walkürenritt' on the other. But it is only fair to say that on no previous occasion has Mr. Henschel shown himself so capable a conductor of Wagner's music. He secured a definitive and for the most part acceptable reading of the various excerpts, and the strongly expressed appreciation of the audience was well deserved.

It has been pointed out that not only is this year the fiftieth anniversary of Herr Joachim's first appearance in London, but that, by a remarkable coincidence, it is also exactly half a century ago that Signor Piatti first played in the English metropolis. The Hungarian violinist played at a benefit concert given by Mr. Bunn at Drury Lane on March 28th, 1844, and on June 24th of the same year Signor Piatti played at a Philharmonic concert at which Mendelssohn also appeared as a pianist. Some recognition of this double jubilee should certainly be made; but it must be left to the countless admirers of two of the greatest instrumental artists of the nineteenth century to say how it should be done.

THE operatic performances given in connexion with our leading musical academies seem to be rapidly growing in importance. Sir Augustus Harris has granted the use of Covent Garden for a performance of 'Carmen' by the students of the Guildhall School of Music early in May. The choice of work is somewhat peculiar. If 'Carmen' is suitable, why not 'La Traviata'?

We regret to hear that Mr. W. T. Best has been compelled to retire from the profession, his health having completely broken down. As a recital player Mr. Best may certainly be regarded as the finest English organist of this or any other century, and his daily performances in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, were marvellous displays of technical skill combined with musicianly feeling.

ACCOUNTS from Berlin represent Mr. Ben Davies as having achieved a very great success in the concert-room. His singing evoked extraordinary enthusiasm, and the local prints are loud in his praise. As much prejudice exists in Germany against English artists, Mr. Davies deserves congratulation on the unlooked-for favour with which he has been received.

WE are sorry to learn, on the authority of Messrs. Paterson, of Edinburgh, at whose Wagner commemoration concert Miss Esther Palliser was to have sung on Tuesday last, that the illness of the charming young American vocalist has assumed such a serious aspect that she has been compelled to cancel all her engagements for the coming spring.

Liszt's oratorio 'The Legend of St. Elizabeth' was announced to be performed under Sir Charles Halle, for the first time at Manchester, on Thursday evening last week. The principal vocalists engaged were Miss Thudichum, Madame Medora Henson, Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black.

THE death is announced of M. Adolphe Sax, the inventor of the saxhorn and companion instruments of the same class which are now universally employed in military bands. Notwithstanding the enormous demand for saxhorns and saxophones, the inventor never amassed a fortune, owing to his lack of capacity in business details, and he is said to have died in poverty.

THE collection of "Minnesänger Lieder," together with the music to which they were set, dating from the fourteenth century, which was recently discovered in the University Library of Jena, is expected to be issued in the original size by means of heliogravure, provided a sufficient number of subscribers can be found for so costly a work. The valuable collection, which includes the famous 'Sängerkrieg auf der Wartburg,' fills 266 folio pages.

strongly recommend others to do the same."—Farmer.

"Besides containing a succinct account of all the more useful and ornamental British forest trees, the volume has a valuable calendar of operations, and excellent chapters on acclimatization, nursery grounds, preparations for tree-planting, including drainage, planting and thinning, pruning, on-side planting, the treatment of coppice and hedgerow timber, harvesting bark, rearing and keeping up hedges, &c."—Journal of Forestry.

TO MABIE, TODD & BARD, Manufacturers of THE SWAN FOUNTAIN PEN, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

5, ENDLEIGH-GARDENS, LONDON, N.W.

January 20, 1894.

Sirs,—I have used the Pen with which I am writing this letter for more than three years with the greatest satisfaction. I sometimes travel without any other companion, but I never feel that I am without a friend as long as I have my faithful "MABIE" with me. Once or twice when, through some carelessness of mine, my COMPANION has been laid aside for a day or two, his steel and quill Substitutes have irritated me so much that I have felt that in such company an editorial life would be well exchanged for that much-maligned but healthy occupation of keeping our high roads in a state of good repair.

Several of my fellow-editors, including Rev. HUGH PRICE-HUGHES and Mr. F. A. ATKINS, rejoice in the possession of a similar companion in their literary labours, and are, I know, equally disposed to bless the skill and inventive genius of Messrs. Mabie, Todd & Bard.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. LUNN,

Editor of The Review of the Churches.MANUFACTURERS' ANNOUNCEMENT.

CHESTERFIELD GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The Governors of the above School will at an early date proceed to the Election of a HEAD MASTER, who will be required to commence duty after the Summer Holidays.

The School is an endowed school, giving a classical and commercial education, and governed under a scheme approved by the Charity Commissioners in 1879, in which it is provided as follows:—

The School shall be a Day and Boarding School for boys between 8 and 11 or a later age with consent of Governors.

The Head Master shall be a Graduate of some University in the United Kingdom.

He need not be in Holy Orders.

He will receive a fixed stipend of £800 per annum, together with a contingent payment of 2s. per year for each scholar, and house rent free.

The number of boys on the roll at the close of last term was 97, and has been higher.

The residences attached to the School (in which the Head Master must reside) is roomy and commodious, and would accommodate twelve boarders.

The Boarding School fee is not to exceed 30s. per year.

The subjects of instruction include Mathematics, Latin, at least one foreign European Language, and Natural Science. The religious instruction given in the School is to be of an undenominational character.

UNDERNEATH the BOUGH. A

Book of Verse, by MICHAEL FIELD. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Printed on hand-made paper at the Chiswick Press, and bound in rough Irish linen.

"I think it is not the mere charm of novelty, the sense that this is the latest gift of a generous poetic giver, which inclines me to believe that the present is the best of those that will be offered in my hands, the one whose contents will be of most in my memory."

Mr. J. M. GRAY, in the Academy.

TWO LIVES: a Poem. By Reginald FANSHAW.

Printed at the Chiswick Press, with binding designed by Gleeson White.

"No reader of this small volume, whether he be perplexed or delighted, can lay it down without a feeling of profound respect for the writer; no critic can read it without seeing that Mr. Fanshawe, so far from being the 'idle singer of an idle lay,' has endeavoured, through a record of his own experience of suffering, to teach in song a lesson worthy of the poet."—Spectator.

"Two Lives: a Poem," by Reginald Fanshawe, is a book which arrests attention. One cannot read it without recognizing its genuine poetic quality. The whole is pervaded by a lofty spirit of tenderness and strength. We shall look forward to another volume from the pen of this writer."—Scottish Leader.

"In conception, form, and expression this is an original poem. Mr. Fanshawe owns no master in the poetic art, and, though amply acknowledging the fascination of Tennyson's muse, he claims, like Swift, that what he writes is all his own. A singularly bold and stimulating poem."

Journal of Education.

CORPUS POETARUM LATINO-

RUM, a so allique denno recognitionum et brevi lectionum varietate instructorum, editit JOHANNES PERCEVAL POSTGATH.

Since the publication of Walker's 'Corpus Poetarum Latinorum,' no second attempt has been made in this country to bring together within the compass of one book the works of the various Latin Poets. The work of which this is the First Part cannot, therefore, be regarded as either superfluous or premature. The aim of the Editor has been to obtain a thoroughly good text, together with such critical notes as seemed to be strictly necessary, from the most competent available authority on each author, so that the book might represent in as trustworthy a form as possible the textual scholarship of the present day. The Second Part is nearly complete and will appear shortly.

The Contents of Part I. are as follows:—
MNIUS, by LUCIAN MULLER.—LUCRETIUS, by the Editor, from the Text of H. A. J. MUNRO.—CATULLUS, by the Editor.—VIRGIL, by HENRY NUTTALL.—HORACE, by JAMES GOW.—TIBULLUS, by EDWARD BILLES.

"No one with any pretensions to classical scholarship can afford to be without it."—Educational Times.

"The whole will be completed in Four Parts, making Two Volumes."

SOCIAL EVOLUTION. By Benjamin Kidd. 8vo. 10s. net.

TIMES.—"The name of Mr. Benjamin Kidd, author of a very striking work on Social Evolution, is, so far as we know, new to the literary world; but it is not often that a new and unknown writer makes his first appearance with a work so novel in conception, so fertile in suggestion, and on the whole so powerful in exposition as 'Social Evolution' appears to us to be. 'Social Evolution' is a book which no serious thinker should neglect and no reader can study without recognizing it as the work of a singularly penetrating and original mind."

BIBLICAL ESSAYS. By J. B. Lightfoot, D.D., late Bishop of Durham. 8vo. 12s.

TIMES.—"As representing all that is now available of the Bishop's profound learning and consummate scholarship for the illustration of his great subject, the present volume and its successor will be warmly welcomed by all students of theology."

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"We have here four papers which are meant to serve as expositions in the Commentary on the Epistles: three on Corinthians, Romans, and Ephesians; and two on the Pastoral Epistles. These all exhibit the learning and scholarship, the fairness and sound critical faculty which have given all Lightfoot's works so wide an influence."

THE EVERLEY SERIES.—NEW VOLUME.

PARTIAL PORTRAITS. By Henry James. Globe 8vo. 5s.

SPEAKER.—"A very delightful volume. What one feels in reading Mr. James, and what makes the reading of him so satisfactory, is that one is in contact with a conscious and distinguished literary artist who possesses a rare talent and who has acquired the mastery of it. The singular subtleties of expression, the power of distinguishing and conveying half-tones and elusive shades of perception which are a mark of that talent, are richly exhibited in this book, and they are exhibited in connexion with a very sane and shrewd critical judgment."

CATHARINE FURZE.

2 vols. cloth, 12s.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"We have no hesitation in saying that it is by far the most impressive, original, and interesting work of fiction that has fallen into our hands for many a month."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A simple and touching story, told with rare skill and power."

SCOTSMAN.—"Can be read many times by the same reader before its interest is exhausted."

CHRISTIAN WORLD.—"Mark Rutherford has treated a risky conception with rare skill and delicacy, and the story, with its strong contrasts of light and shade, fascinates the reader."

ATHENÆUM.—"A book by 'Mark Rutherford' is quite a treat....Mark Rutherford has a fine sense of humour..... 'Catharine Furze' should be read not once, but many times."

A REMARKABLE NOVEL.

"Uncommonly well worth reading."
National Observer.

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

REVIEW of REVIEWS.—"The anonymous author presents a primal passion, unencumbered of the trappings of shame and habit, with a simplicity and directness unequalled in recent English fiction. In short, 'A Superfluous Woman' is a clever book, and a useful. Whether it will attain the success of 'The Heavenly Twins' is yet to be seen, but the good that it will do will be much on the same lines."

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A novel upon which has been expended an infinity of thought, and the pages of which betray a capacity for the analysis of human feelings and emotions rarely met with."

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"There is much strong and some pathetic writing in 'A Superfluous Woman,' and we dare say it will be proclaimed a remarkable book. It shows power and imagination in no small degree."

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

NATIONAL OBSERVER.—"The book is best where it is nearest passionate life. There are singular qualities—force, cleverness, insight—in the last scene between Jessamine and Colin, and in that of her lonely death. Altogether the book has a great deal of good in it, is refreshing and frank, and is uncommonly well worth reading."

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

STANDARD.—"A love story that is a very remarkable piece of writing, told with real power and beauty. The author is full of undisciplined power; she has poetry and passion and courage, and, unless we are mistaken, has a future before her. The last two or three pages of her book lift it into a poem."

A SUPERFLUOUS WOMAN.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"A Superfluous Woman' is a bold work. We are very much afraid that 'the young person' will not be allowed to read it. If so, we sincerely hope that she will do so without permission; for though it may not be the best novel of the season, it is amongst those best worth reading."

CORRESPONDENCE OF MR. JOSEPH JEKYLL with his Sister-in-Law, LADY GERTRUDE SLOANE STANLEY. 1818-1838. Edited, with a Brief Memoir, by the Hon. ALGERNON BOURKE.

TIMES.—"A very slight inspection of these letters will convince any one that they well deserved to be disinterred and given to the world, not only as portraying a notable figure in the society of the period, but as a valuable, interesting, and sprightly addition to contemporary memoirs."

ATHENÆUM.—"Altogether, Jekyll's letters make the most excellent reading."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The Jekyll letters must become one of the leading books of the season."

3 vols. crown 8vo. 24s.

SECOND EDITION of the PAMIRS: being a Narrative of a Year's Expedition on Horseback and on Foot through Kashmir, Western Tibet, Chinese Tartary, and Russian Central Asia. By the EARL OF DUNMORE. With Maps and Illustrations taken by the Author on the Spot.

WORLD.—"The incidents of an extraordinary feat of exploration—no Englishman has ever crossed the Choo Choo Mountains in Chinese Tartary before—and the experiences and observations of a unique journey are related in a lucid and cultivated style, wholly devoid of either brag, affectation, or assumption."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"For sportiveness there is much to read in these two volumes of grand hunting days after the 'evil poll,' the Tibetan antelopes and wild horses."

The CHRISTIAN ETHIC. By William Knight, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews.

SCOTSMAN.—"The subject treated in this volume is one of great interest and importance... and therefore a treatise devoted to its elucidation by so competent a writer as Prof. Knight is to be cordially welcomed."

LITERARY WORLD.—"This is a useful little book... at once scholarly and unpretentious, careful in its treatment of theoretic questions, but eminently practical."

NEW VOLUME OF UNIVERSITY EXTENSION MANUALS, EDITED BY PROFESSOR KNIGHT,

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

The JACOBÆAN POETS. By Edmund Gosse.

TIMES.—"Among living authorities upon English literature, and especially English poetry, Mr. Edmund Gosse is certainly unsurpassed, and probably unequalled, in range of learning, shrewdness of critical instinct, and grace of style be all thrown into the balance. Each of these three qualifications is displayed in his volume upon 'The Jacobean Poets.'"

Crown 8vo. 6s.

HANDBOOK for OXFORDSHIRE. A New Edition. With numerous Maps and Plans and a Full Description of Oxford and its Colleges.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"Hitherto Oxfordshire has been lumped in Mr. Murray's series together with Berks and Bucks into one volume. It is now given a volume to itself, and a very attractive handbook it makes. There are excellent plans and maps, including ground plans of all the more important Oxford colleges. The architectural and antiquarian is as informing as it always is in a 'Murray,' and has been brought thoroughly up to date. The type is particularly clear and pleasant, while limp covers and rounded edges make the book easily pocketable."

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

An INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of the GREEK TESTAMENT. With Concise Grammar, Notes, and Vocabulary. By THEOPHILUS D. HALL, M.A.

This Volume is intended to aid those who desire to study the New Testament in the original Greek Text without any previous knowledge of the language.

EDUCATIONAL TIMES.—"This volume is designed, not for the person preparing for the Locals or any other examination, but for the grown-up student of the New Testament who has not acquired a knowledge of Greek in his earlier years. Such a class is distinctly well worth catering for, and this catering is excellent."

SPEAKER.—"No better or more scholarly 'Introduction to the Greek Testament' could be placed in the hands of young students than the admirable and thoroughly practical manual which Mr. Theophilus Hall—for many years a professor of Languages in the University of Manchester—has just prepared. Mr. Hall has done excellent service by the publication of this able little work, and doubtless young theological students and ministers will find it of great service."

In 3 vols. By "IOTA."

Athenæum.

"The warmest of welcomes is due from the reading public to any new author who conspicuously unites the qualities of intuition, candour, respect for the human and the divine, and such a natural straightforwardness as, taken together with the other three qualities, cannot fail to touch and move the heart. A welcome of this kind is unquestionably due to 'Iota.' Few who read these three volumes will deny to 'Iota' an ample, if need be a generous, recognition of the manner in which she has achieved her purpose. The characters are drawn with a notable combination of delicacy and downrightness, and with a pathos which is as effective as it is refined."

Spectator.

"A remarkable performance, the author having singular command of striking phrases and a genius for suggesting, rather than describing character."

Speaker.

"We do not pretend to be able to do justice to 'A YELLOW ASTER' in the space at our command. It is no ordinary novel, either in conception or in treatment, and we feel no surprise at the gossip which has attributed it to at least one woman of well-recognized genius. Altogether a notable book."

Daily Telegraph.

"A Saul has arisen among the fictional prophets. 'A YELLOW ASTER' is distinctly a work of genius, remarkable for novelty of plot, force of diction, grace of literary style, and subtlety of physical analysis. In short, 'A YELLOW ASTER' is one of those rare novels of superb quality which compel the icest criticism to thaw and resolve itself into warm admiration and unqualified praise."

Westminster Gazette.

"A first impression is that 'A YELLOW ASTER' is one of the very best novels we have read for many months; a second, that, in saying this, we do it rather less than justice. For it is a novel apart, with a strikingly original subject, which is worked out with a skill which is altogether unusual. This is a strong and excellent story, which, with all its pathos and tragedy, has the refreshment of a tonic. We shall be surprised if it does not rank among the novels of the year."

Daily Chronicle.

"The main idea is a fine one, and is finely treated; half a dozen chapters of real power follow one another with a noble swing and a sustained force that never degenerates into mere excitement. The book is a clever and interesting one; it is about something, and about something which is new, because people have only just begun to think and talk about it. It will not only be read, it will be useful as well as entertaining to those who read it."

Weekly Sun.

"Unmistakably the book of the hour. Its own transcendent merits were sufficient to ensure its being talked about. No Aubrey Tanqueray need debar his daughter from reading 'A YELLOW ASTER' through fear lest the white robe of her purity may become a little dusty at the hem. Bold the book is, and daring alike in conception and treatment, but its atmosphere is sweet and pure as well as invigorating. The dialogue is sparkling, and is irradiated ever and anon by bright flashes of humour; and it abounds in fine passages. 'A YELLOW ASTER' must leap into wide and ever wider popularity."

Lady's Pictorial (Leader).

"During the past week every one has been discussing a new novel. 'A YELLOW ASTER' has made a great and immediate success purely on its own merits."

LITERATURE

The Great Pestilence (A.D. 1348-1349), now commonly known as the Black Death. By Francis Aidan Gasquet, D.D., O.S.B. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

DR. GASQUET is growing proficient in the art and mystery of historical research. His volumes on the suppression of the monasteries are a considerable contribution to the literature of the subject; and now he has gone a good way towards making a permanent reputation for himself in a scholarly monograph upon the great pestilence. During the last twenty years or so the importance of this calamity has been far more accurately appreciated than during the five centuries since it burst upon the world; and evidence, direct and indirect, has been accumulating from all quarters which has thrown new light upon its course, its severity, and the momentous consequences that followed in its track. Dr. Gasquet has summarized this evidence, and has added to it some remarkable information laboriously collected from unprinted sources. Not only has he availed himself of the learned works of recent French and German inquirers, but he has searched diligently among the public archives and the episcopal registries, and has, besides these, laid under contribution the collections of Muratori and other learned compilers. The result appears in an unpretentious volume of little more than 250 pages, which not only brings the history of the plague up to date, but tells us all that is likely to be known of the subject for a considerable time to come. It was Dr. Joesopp who first pointed out the value of the episcopal records as sources of information on the incidence of the pestilence upon the clergy and the extent of the mortality among them, but Dr. Gasquet in following up this line of inquiry seems to have attempted an almost exhaustive examination of the bishops' registers. The harvest he has gathered is appalling. But the direct testimony of contemporaries and eye-witnesses, who have told what they saw while themselves going in and out among the dead and dying, is much more abundant than was generally known. Knighton, a canon of Leicester, Galfrid le Baker, and others of the chroniclers supply some more or less harrowing details of the course of the pestilence in England; but Dr. Gasquet has introduced us to the dreadful narrative of Simon de Cervius at Montpellier, and given extracts from Peter Azarius, an eye-witness of the terrible time in Lombardy; from an anonymous ecclesiastic who was at Avignon when the dead were more than the living; and above all from the chronicle of Giles li Mussis, who was a canon of Tournay apparently during all the time the plague was raging.

Not the least valuable of Dr. Gasquet's labours has been that spent upon the study of the "chronology" of the plague. He has evidently taken a great deal of trouble to trace its course as it travelled from the East over almost the whole of Europe, spreading desolation through every country from the Crimea to the Atlantic, from Italy to Scandinavia, from the islands in the Mediterranean to Iceland, where it burst forth among the people, high and low, with frightful violence. Nevertheless, the result of this laborious investigation leaves us almost as perplexed as before. All that is certain is that the plague was raging in Sicily during October, 1347, and continued to claim its victims till the following April, about which time it appeared suddenly in Lombardy and Venice, and all through the Valley of the Po, at Marseilles and Avignon, in Normandy and at Paris, in Spain and in the Baltic, but did not reach England till July, 1348, when its first appearance is said to have been noticed at Melcombe, in Dorsetshire. Nothing that the conscientious industry of Dr. Gasquet has produced seems to us to lend sufficient support to any hypothesis which has endeavoured to account for the direction of its march, or even to show that it followed any definable line. Patches of country here and there seem to have escaped the visitation. In Germany, where it appeared at all, it was in a milder form. Whether the great cities of Belgium suffered from it seems doubtful; if those large centres of population, Ghent and Antwerp and Ypres and Bruges, had been visited by the scourge, some record of the fact would surely have survived. In England, during its first and most dreadful visitation in 1348-49, it was noticed that it carried off an enormous number of the labourers in the country villages, the poor and the workmen in the towns, the monks and nuns and friars, that is, all that portion of the population who were ill housed, ill clothed, ill nurtured, or, like those in the religious houses, lived habitually upon an insufficient diet, among whom the practice of asceticism in various forms tended to bring about a weakening of their stamina and their vital power. On the other hand, the mortality among the clergy was far in excess of that among any other class, and this can be attributed only to their noble self-sacrifice in the discharge of their ministerial duties among their parishioners. Breathing day and night the pestilential air, working heroically among the people in every stage of the disease, comforting the dying, and burying the dead in the huge pits that were dug to contain the putrid corpses, the priests dropped by thousands into the same graves in which they had helped to lay their people; and before the year was out the supply of clergy had begun to fall short very seriously over all the land. At Florence, Boccaccio tells us, "it became necessary to dig trenches into which the bodies were put by hundreds, laid in rows as goods packed in a ship; a little earth was cast upon each successive layer until the pits were filled to the top." At Avignon several almost as soon as they were seized with the sickness "were carried off to the pit and buried. And in this way many were buried alive." At Vienna "the dead were buried in trenches, each of which, according to one chronicle, contained some 6,000 corpses." In London Sir Walter Manny provided a new cemetery more than thirteen acres in extent "in respect of the danger that might befall in this time of so great a plague and infection."

It is idle to quote the numbers which are given of the deaths in this town or in that; very little reliance is to be placed upon them, though in some cases—and notably at Bremen on the Weser, where the authorities appear to have shown extraordinary courage and presence of mind—something like a census of the dead was attempted parish by parish. Whether we shall ever be able to arrive at an estimate of the population of England at the outbreak of the pestilence which shall be accepted among historians seems more than doubtful. Mr. Thorold Rogers was of opinion that two millions and a half would cover it. Dr. Gasquet doubles this, and the probability is that the estimate in one case is too small; in the other it is surely too large. Whether few or many, half that population was swept off.

It seems almost impossible for a specialist who has devoted time and thought to an inquiry so absorbing and so horrifying as this to avoid exaggerating the effects of the visitation, and making it do duty as the origin of almost every evil that followed it. For instance, Dr. Gasquet is inclined to attribute to the mortality of 1349 the decline in the number and the influence of the monasteries and their inmates which is observable in the next century. This is more than doubtful. The Black Death, of course, contributed to bring about the decay of English monasticism; but other and very potent influences were at work in the same direction, for the universities had already begun to take the educational work of the abbeys out of their hands, and found no difficulty in adding to their endowments and retaining their hold upon the rising generation, while the religious houses had the utmost difficulty in keeping up the numbers of their brethren, and the stream of benefactions in their favour had quite stopped. It is hardly to be wondered at that Dr. Gasquet should endeavour to minimize the religious awakening due to the Lollards. That is a matter which we are hardly yet ready to deal with: Dr. Gasquet and the Wyclif Society with their friends and supporters may be left to fight it out between them. Meanwhile the picture of the general desolation of the country when the plague had left our shores, which forms the subject of Dr. Gasquet's ninth chapter, is quite vivid enough and horrible enough to incline the reader to believe that every sort of evil may well have ensued as the direct consequence of so overwhelming a calamity. And yet it must be remembered that, before and after the plague, the Hundred Years' War went on with all its battles and its bloodshed; the soldiers of fortune were never more to the fore; the demoralizing, the brutalizing effect of the ceaseless plotting and planning of sieges and pillage and plunder and conquest must have made the nation as a whole scornful of the life of devotion and peaceful retirement. The days when it had been said by any large proportion of the people cedant arma toga had past; their joys had become more than ever before "joys of conquest, not of peace."

It remains only to congratulate Dr. Gasquet upon the accomplishment of a task which has been carried out with ability and success. It is a long time since an English Benedictine monk has done such good work as this, and it is not a little significant that, just as it is becoming apparent that the parochial clergy of the Established Church are ceasing to be men of learning and culture, Jesuits, Oratorians, and other battalions of the Papal army should be sending forth scholars and accomplished students, who are taking prominent positions as teachers of history among us—teachers, too, who deserve a hearing and will retain it.

Glimpses of Church and Social Life in the Highlands in Olden Times. By Alexander Macpherson. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THIS handsome compilation should be more widely popular than local histories in general. Not only will it appeal to numerous readers who have enjoyed rest and sport in Badenoch, where stands the kingly Cairngorm,

From his heaven-kissing crown
On the wealth of pine clad valleys
Northward looking grandly down, but many of her sons, whose fathers parted from her to the strains of "Cha till sinn tuillich" will, if we may trust the list of subscribers appended, welcome a book which so pleasantly sets before them the country of their origin, although the scope of the work does not include those observations of nature with which "Nether Lochaber" has enriched his records of a neighbouring district, nor have the present annals that touch of personal acquaintance with characteristic representatives of a by-gone day which gave so much charm to the 'Memorabilia' of the late Donald Sage.

On the other hand, we have here more local history, properly so called; and Badenoch (Baideanach in the vernacular, probably connected with bàith, drown, submerge) is not destitute of historical interest. Under the old régime of the Comyns, and in the later times of the "Wolf," Alexander Stuart, it had its share of convulsions, and the predominant race (the Macphersons, or Clan Mhuirich) bore a part in political strife which is familiar to most people. From the days when the Clan-y-ha and the Clan Ghuale—Davidsons and Macphersons according to the best account—waged the fatal battle of the North Inch of Perth, to those in which Alastair MacMhaighstir called the Cluny of the '45 to the ranks of Tearlach MacSheumais, the race of Gillochattan has ever been in the thick of Highland warfare. The antagonism of the rival tribe of MacIntosh, under which for some centuries the Macphersons suffered, provided a perpetual stimulus to internecine struggles, alternating with touching episodes of union of all branches of Clan Chattan in the stress of conflict with some common enemy. No mere Batrachomyomachia was this typical warfare. When "Macallan More came from the west" in 1594, to earn what God should send him from the forfeitures that might be hoped from the discovery of the "Spanish blanks," he had 10,000 men with whom to assault Cluny (unsuccessfully) in the Castle of Ruthven. At Harlaw, a battle of the first importance, Badenoch was on the side of comparative civilization. At Corrichie the rival chiefs were in opposing camps. The thread of continuity which connects these mediæval politics is clearly traced in these pages. Roughly, it consists of the adherence on MacMhuirich's side to Gordon, and on that of MacIntosh to the successive potentates who represented Moray, the legal superiors on each side of the territory occupied by the respective chiefs, and illustrates the general interdependence and frequent antagonism of the patriarchal and feudal systems in the Highlands.

An interesting chapter derived from the MSS. of "old Biallid" (Capt. Lachlan Macpherson of that place, who died in 1858) details the fortunes of Cluny of the '45, who for nine years lurked in hiding among the rocks and caves of his country, in spite of the efforts of the Hanoverian Government to apprehend him. Since his day a modern chief as gallant has been seen—one "who delighted in old kindly usages," and was a living reminder of the best side of the clanish tradition. Those who saw him at the Edinburgh review of 1881 felt that he "connotted" far more than a rural potentate at the head of a fine body of volunteers. The late Ewen Macpherson of Cluny naturally fills a large place in the history of the district in which he lived, among the people whose tongue and feelings were his own.

Church life in Badenoch, as elsewhere in the Highlands, means Protestant Church life. There has been a revival in the present century of Roman Catholicism, and in certain districts, as in Moidart, there has never been a breach in the adhesion of the people to that faith, but, on the whole, the change of church government appears to have led to little friction among a population which it may be believed was as much pagan as Catholic. Undoubtedly the early efforts of the Church of Scotland, in days when the Gaelic-speaking area was so much larger than at present, to expound its principles through "readers in the Irish tongue" formed a successful contrast to ecclesiastical policy in other Celtic portions of these isles. Still, the early ministers had often a stormy time, and we read in many parts of the country of some "ministoir laidir" or "ministoir mòr," who found his physical prowess stand him in good stead. Such men as "Bishop John" Macdonald, who subdued a drunken funeral party breci manu, or Duncan Macpherson of Laggan, who could baptize a child across the flooded Spey with unerring dexterity of aim, were invaluable in early times. But the docility with which, on the whole, the Highlanders submitted to the tyranny of church courts, and their prying into every detail of private life, is remarkable, and must have sprung from the instinct of spiritual submission exhibited in Catholic, and no doubt in "Druidical" times. For the Celt, indeed, "New Presbyter was but old Priest writ large." Yet, when one reads of the discipline inflicted in Covenanting times on the defected adherents of Montrose, and the abounding evidence in the same church records of the hostility of the ecclesiastics to the musical and other consolations of their wild parishioners, it is impossible to doubt that a desire to free themselves from such a yoke must have been in many cases an inducement to the Highlanders to cast in their lot with political insurrection. In the session-books of Kingussie, Alvie, and Laggan are many quaint entries, dealing with such matters as "prophanation of the Lord's day," breach of promise, assault, "fiddling at lykewakes," and the fathering of bairns; but severe as they were, the ministers were good shepherds on the whole; and it is creditable to them that such a typical chief as Cluny of the '45 adhered to his faith, to his own great disadvantage, in his impoverished and friendless exile. His transcendent services were counterbalanced at the French Court by his obstinate heresy. Among the curious extracts in the Kingussie books is one relating how the notorious Lord George Sackville, marching past Ruthven Barracks on his mission of so-called military execution to be indicted on the hapless Jacobites, gave "half a guinea" to "the poor of the parish" of Kingussie. The session seems to have been puzzled with the gift from such a remarkable quarter. After much debate

"they appointed half-a-crown to be given to Donald McPherson, now in Claignan, as a great object of charity, and the remainder to be employed in building the bridge of Goyneack."

Kingussie, the ancient church of which parish is said to have been planted by St. Columba himself, was early included in the Presbyterian system, the first "reader and exhorter," John Glas, being presented by James VI. in 1572. The name of the neighbouring parish of Laggan immediately suggests that of the inimitable Mrs. Grant, whose husband was its minister. A charming portrait, from a miniature taken in the sixty-ninth year of her age, gives us the presentment of the author of 'Letters from the Mountains.' Extracts from her works are cited as evidence to character in two much-debated cases. She and her husband were friendly believers in "Ossian" Macpherson, otherwise Macpherson of Belleville, who, of course, takes a prominent space in a history of his native district, and whose property there has descended to the issue of his daughter by the late Sir David Brewster, who was also his loyal admirer. Another, to whose memory the good estimation of so wise a judge is favourable, is one of less extended fame, the celebrated "Black Officer," Macpherson of Ballochroan, the perversion of whose exploits in recruiting for the Highland regiments has made him, most unjustly, a sort of bugbear of local tradition to this day, and whose death by an avalanche in the forest of Guick, in company with his four gillies, is cited as a judgment on his cruelty. We are on the side of the angels in this matter, and would believe him, on the testimony of Malcolm Macintyre, rather to have been a fortress of the needy and a succourer of the distressed.

Oid'agus athair an fheumach,

'Choibbheadh air aircich 's air éignich,

A history of Badenoch would not be complete without a reference to the Dukes of Gordon of the ancient line, a portrait of the last of whom, and one of the famous Jane Maxwell, his mother, adorn these pages. On the whole, the reader may derive from them a fair idea of a district typically Highland, and as late as the beginning of this century an inexhaustible recruiting ground. Gone are the Black Officer and scores of other veterans who finished their days as "tacksmen" among their rustic neighbours. Gone, too, are the rank and file, whose names are not preserved, but "who conquered for us in every quarter of the globe." The country is richer, but no stronger, for their absence:—

Books about Books. Edited by Alfred W. Pollard.—Early Printed Books. By E. Gordon Duff.—Early Illustrated Books: a History of the Decoration and Illustration of Books in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By Alfred W. Pollard. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

It is a hard task in England to write a bibliographical work with any chance of its finding a publisher. A series of scholarly bibliographical monographs would not pay; the public for such works is too small, and they could only be undertaken, like Mr. Conway's volume on the Dutch woodcutters, by a university press. On the other hand, there is a very considerable number of more or less dilatanti book-buyers for whom collectors' manuals of various types possess a distinct attraction, and for whom more than one publisher delights to cater. We fear that Mr. Pollard's series may miss the two types of readers. Neither Mr. Duff nor Mr. Pollard has produced a monograph for scholars, but their books are much above the level of the various manuals on the printed book which have appeared during the last few years. Both works endeavour to cover too much ground; both accordingly degenerate at times into little more than catalogues. Both are neatly printed, are of handy form, and have passable reproductions. In both the reproductions occasionally fail to give any idea of the original, owing to the size of the volume, to the method of reproduction employed, or to the poor or late state of the original selected. For example, take in Mr. Pollard's book the 1541 title-border to Pynson's edition of 'The Image of Governance,' and compare it with the title-border to Erasmus's 'Epigrammata,' which is continuously pagged with Froben's edition of Sir Thomas More's 'Utopia' of 1518. Look at Mr. Pollard's reproduction under the magnifying glass. It is not only the worn-out condition of the block after twenty-three years' use, but the badness of Mr. Pollard's method of reproduction, which is revealed. This title-page is very beautiful, Mr. Pollard remarks. So it is in Sir Thomas More's 'Utopia,' but in Mr. Pollard's volume the reader who has never seen the original might fairly question Mr. Pollard's artistic judgment. If it be not Mr. Pollard but his publishers who are to blame, surely we may ask whether his text would not have been more interesting had he actually pointed out the relation between the 'Utopia' of 1518 and the Pynson title-page of 1541. What we have said with regard to this reproduction applies with equal force to the Broydenbach cuts and the illustrations to the French Home. Those who know the originals must make an unfavourable comparison between Mr. Pollard's illustrations and the reproductions from the same or similar volumes given even in such a superficial work as Bouchot's 'The Printed Book.' Much the same criticism applies to the type-reproductions in Mr. Duff's volume, and he sins greatly when he does not give even the size of the originals he has reduced.

Turning from the reproductions to the text, we find that, if Mr. Pollard tells us nothing particularly new, he is never dull. Mr. Duff, on the other hand, claims in his preface to have "attempted rather to draw attention to more out-of-the-way information than to recapitulate what is already to be found in the majority of bibliographical books." He dedicates his volume to Henry Bradshaw, and lays claim in more than one place to a high standard of scientific criticism; he must, therefore, expect to be judged from his own standpoint. Possibly no study would have been more interesting than to have watched unobscured Mr. Bradshaw turning over the pages of Mr. Duff's book—in the presence of Mr. Duff. "No doubt," Mr. Duff writes, "in time, when the Cologne press has been more carefully studied, the identity of some of these printers will be discovered; but at present there are a great many difficulties waiting to be cleared up."

Then why not strive to solve some of these difficulties before writing about early printing? They are not so recondite as might appear, when the Cologne books are once grouped and compared. A careful comparison of the text and cuts of the various Dutch and Cologne editions of the 'Fasciculus Temporum' goes a good way. A careful comparison of the works issued by Quentel's first press—with due regard to the "natural history" method—might have helped Mr. Duff to save Mr. Pollard from writing:—

"About 1490 there appeared a great Bible in two volumes, in the type and with the borders which are found in books signed by Heinrich Quentel."

As a matter of fact Quentel issued two such Bibles, and that both appeared before the 'Fasciculus Temporum' of 1479 may be demonstrated from the condition of the borders. The two Bibles are without printed signatures, which all other volumes issued by Quentel have; this, taken with their want of dating, places them before the cutless 'Summa Virtutum' and 'Summa de Viciis' of 1479, and the 'Astexanus' of the same year. Now the Bibles must be later than January, 1477, and therefore, allowing for the amount of work already known as completed by Quentel in 1479, we can name 1478-9 as the actual date of the appearance of the Bibles, the one in Westphalian dialect being in our judgment, from the state of the cuts, earlier than the one we take to be in Cologne local dialect. With regard to these very cuts Mr. Pollard makes a singular statement. He says that Anton Koburger used them again at Nuremberg, "rejecting nineteen of the thirty-one New Testament illustrations." Of which Cologne Bible is he speaking? The only cuts we know of are four of the evangelists, one for the heading of the epistles, a triple cut at the beginning of the Apocalypse, and seven illustrative Apocalyptic cuts—thirteen cuts in all. Of these the last seven fail in the Westphalian dialect Bible; all appear in the Cologne dialect Bible, the epistle cut repeated nine times; and all but the epistle cut appear in the Koburger Bible. The Koburger has, therefore, six cuts more than the first, one cut less than the second Cologne Bible. How Mr. Pollard reaches his thirty-one and nineteen it would be interesting to know. Perhaps he has excoctigated them from the description given in the "monumental work" of Dr. Muther; but, unluckily, Dr. Muther is about the most untrustworthy writer that ever ventured to study early German woodcuts. Mr. Pollard notes that the famous Cologne cuts "influenced later engravers for many years," and cites Hans Holbein's Old Testament designs. A much more striking example lies at hand in Albrecht Dürer's Apocalyptic cuts.

Mr. Duff's remark on the Cologne presses has led us, however, a long way from his monograph, to which we must now return. On the blockbooks he has little new to tell his readers, nor does he use what few data exist to throw light on the probable date of the crude woodcuts which are so often given "as early fifteenth century." He cites Otley as of opinion that a certain English 'Image of Pity' might be of as early a date as the famous 'St. Christopher,' "but that is a point impossible to determine." Why? Need we point out to Mr. Duff that to answer such questions is the bibliographer's reason for existing, and that in the images of pity we have two most important clues, namely, the details of the instruments of the Passion and the years of indulgence granted? The appearance of the sweat-cloth is a very characteristic mark, but the years of indulgence are even better. Let Mr. Duff form a collection of the years of indulgence granted on various dated documents, and he will soon find that the amount of indulgence increases with the centuries from a few days or years to several thousand years, 26 mill' (£26,000) in the case of one of the English cuts. Thousands, to say nothing of millions, of years' indulgence will hardly be found before 1460, and Sixtus IV. and Julius II. (1471-82 and 1503-13 respectively) were the Popes most prodigal of the heavenly treasure. Hence the English cuts are not likely to antedate the invention of printing. Talking about indulgences, we may turn to a remark of Mr. Pollard's that the execution of the cut of St. Gregory's mass in Königsheven's 'Chronik' of 1476 is inferior to that of the other cuts, "but as a woodcut inscription promised a special indulgence for every Paternoster said before it, it was probably esteemed the most highly." Yet every good Catholic of those days knew that the indulgence attached to the Vernicle, the subject of the second cut, was even more extensive—amounting, if we remember rightly, to 30,000 instead of some 13,000 years. The popularity of the Vernicle probably accounts for its absence in several copies of the 'Chronik' we have come across.

Of other points in Mr. Duff's work, we may notice his somewhat superficial treatment of the 'Costeriana.' Our own review of Mr. Heessels's 'Haarlem, not Mentz,' pointed out that although Mr. Heessels's bias was everywhere obvious and his arguments were frequently illogical, there were substantial difficulties about the 'Costeriana' which only patient and scholarly study could surmount. We may have to date them 'circa 1473,' but this can only be done after due discovery of evidence, otherwise we had better confine ourselves 'to facts and avoid theories.' Again, speaking of library arrangement, Mr. Duff writes:—

"In the University Library, Cambridge, the fifteenth century books are all placed together, arranged under countries according to size..... Any further subdivision, as, for instance, under towns, is impracticable on the shelves, but must be done on paper."

Why? Subdivision by towns, and by printers also, is carried out in one great library, that at Basle, which is consequently the most perfect library for the bibliographer to work in.

Of Mr. Duff's book as a whole it must be said that while it is better than any book-collector's manual of the same size known to us, the bibliographic student will gain very little from its pages. In both Mr. Duff's and Mr. Pollard's volumes there is a singular absence of reference to monographs and papers wherein the reader might find further information.

Mr. Pollard, also, does not refer to the many excellent reprints of early illustrated works which have appeared of recent years in Germany, and which often fall within the means of the humbler student. Indeed, Mr. Pollard's omissions are rather numerous. Thus he tells us that of the three great works designed by Maximilian as a personal monument, the 'Theuerdank' appeared in 1517, but the 'Weiskunig' not till 1775. He does not, however, state that the third and last, the 'Freydal,' was ultimately published in 1881. Under Dürer also we find no reference to his books on proportion and fortification, while Tory's attempts on the true proportions of letters, printed in 1529, are only intelligible when reference is made to Dürer's 'Unterweisung der Messung' of 1525 and Pacioli's 'Divina Proportione' of 1509. Why should Schöffer's 'Virgil' be omitted? Why—if, as the title-page tells us, the work is a history of decoration and illustration of books in the sixteenth as well as the fifteenth century—does Feyeraud receive no attention, nor is any reference made to the works of Sebastian Munster? Very incomplete, too, is the treatment of the Renaissance ornamentation of books, and its gradual degradation in the theological struggles of the Reformation. Luther's Bibles and catechisms at least deserved a few lines and a specimen reproduction. The German Josephuses are passed by, although the French one receives ample attention. The cut Mr. Pollard reproduces from it is described by him as the entry "of a king and his staff into a captured town." Now the crown is not that of a king, but the sort of mitre usually put by mediæval illustrators on the Jewish priests and elders. In this case the cut represents Joshua entering Jericho; in the background Rahab may be seen descending from her house on the wall. On the whole, the French chapters are much better done than the German, the misprints in the latter—e.g., "Bodner's" and "Boden's Edelstein" and "Thomas Sirar," for Boner's Edelstein and Thomas Lirer—seeming to mark that Mr. Pollard is not quite so thoroughly at home on German ground. The Italian pages are as complete as we could hope for in a manual of these dimensions, but the influence of German on Italian book-illustration is not sufficiently emphasized; no better representation of the mixture of German ground-design with Italian grace and finish could have been cited than the cut from the 'Devote Meditation' reproduced on p. 95.

Mr. Duff contributes a chapter on early English book-illustration to Mr. Pollard's volume, which ends the work, perhaps, somewhat abruptly. To sum up then, these two volumes of the "Books about Books" do not reach the highest standard of scholarship or knowledge; yet they are better than similar books recently published in England so far as their text is concerned, hardly so good in their reproductions. They will scarcely be of service to trained bibliographers; they may teach something to the untrained collector.

Riding Recollections and Turf Stories. By Henry Custance. (Arnold.)

Horse Racing in England: a Synoptical Review. By Robert Black. (Bentley & Son.)

No pleasanter duty can devolve upon a reviewer than that of certifying that an author has succeeded more than indifferently well in a literary effort undertaken with a special purpose. So much, at the very least, must be conceded to Mr. Custance. The many thousands to whom an ex-jockey, especially such an ex-jockey as he, is an oracle, and to whom a teller of horse-flavoured stories, especially such a teller as he, is as irresistible as the Ancient Mariner was to the wedding guest, will be more than satisfied, probably, with his book. At the same time, it must be remembered that it is not given to all mankind to enter into the spirit of a book dealing for the most part with characters, incidents, and stories which only by the initiated, to whom the ways and language of jockeys are familiar, can be appreciated properly. That the work is written in the style which might be expected of an ex-jockey, assisted by a valued contributor to the columns of a sporting newspaper, is to the credit of the author as a narrator of an unvarnished, unpretentious tale, and is a fact upon which the numerous readers whom his name and fame cannot fail to attract are to be congratulated, although the person commonly described as the general reader may require the aid of a tutor sometimes before the interest of one story and the point of another can be brought out with satisfactory clearness.

Some of the most amusing remarks are the author's own, apparently made with the most ingenuous innocence. For instance, at p. 112 we read:—

"In speaking of one whom I consider all round to be the finest jockey I ever saw or rode against, it is needless for me to say that I refer to my dear old friend, George Fordham. He was the most unassuming and, perhaps, honest man I ever met."

The modifying adverb is quite delicious. At p. 118, again, we are told, "My friend suggested a drink, and I think I concurred"; but in this case there is some reason to believe that the implied uncertainty is an intentional stroke of that sly humour for which the writer is understood to be celebrated.

As the work is of an autobiographical character, it may be well to give a brief sketch of the author's professional career up to the time at which he relinquished the racing-saddle for the starter's flag, which in these days is wielded officially sometimes by a scion of a noble house. He was not born in a stable, we learn, but, having horse upon the brain, took very early to riding races—on half-holidays when he was a schoolboy, in fact—and soon became the winner of a modest prize in the shape of a saddle, which, however, though he had won it, he was not allowed to carry off without maintaining his rights with his fists. After some rough experience, during which he made the acquaintance of George Fordham before mentioned, Mr. Custance found himself in 1860, being then eighteen years of age, associated with the stable presided over by the renowned trainer Matthew Dawson at Ruseley, and having for chief patron the late Mr. James Merry, M.P., no less memorable for his many excellent race-horses than for his willingness to vote for the abolition of the Decalogus (of which he had never heard before) if he could thereby meet the views of his constituency. Mr. Custance had now his chance of rising to eminence and affluence. He rode Thormanby for the Derby, and was only prevented by a broken collar-bone from winning the Two Thousand and Lord Lyon, as well as the Derby and the St. Leger that he did win on that famous horse. He also won the Derby on George Frederick. The Two Thousand and the Oaks he never gained; but the One Thousand he won on Achievement. He rode many great horses, including the illustrious Sterling, and many dangerous ones, including the savage Broomielaw; and he had established a reputation as a horseman inferior to few, if any, when he suddenly retired from the occupation of a jockey in 1879. The reason for his retirement was sound: he felt (and his feeling was confirmed by medical authority) that it was as much as his life was worth to go on "wasting" in order to bring himself down to the number of pounds at which he would have had to ride. He therefore very wisely sacrificed the chances which the insane practice, beginning even then to prevail, of giving jockeys the salaries of county-court judges, the retainers of leading Queen's counsel, and more than princely presents, undoubtedly offered him of realizing a large fortune, and adopted a different though cognate mode of life. He has now published a book, in which, besides the entertainment provided for the sort of readers whom he desires particularly to please, he records some facts and delivers some opinions worthy of attention from a very different class of persons, who never miss an opportunity of expatiating upon the cruelty, the gambling, and the blackguardism which are the constant concomitants of horse-racing. Let such persons read what Mr. Custance says about the custom of running horses in blinkers, in order that the poor nervous beasts may not see when they are going to receive a "severe hiding" with the whip which, in their case, it is better to discard altogether; about the savage brutality with which the jockey Wells vented his displeasure at being called upon to ride Count Batthyany's obstinate horse Tambour Major in the Derby of 1863; about the fury with which loss of money by betting caused the losers to regard a matter at which they would otherwise have laughed as an amusing mistake on the part of the near-sighted count; and about the diabolical scene which ensued when the Oaks of 1864 was won by Fille de l'Air.

Mr. Custance seems to have depended a little too confidently upon his memory sometimes, especially in what he tells us about the late Lord Glasgow, who, according to Mr. Custance, by his single black ball succeeded to the day of his death in keeping Col. Forester out of the Jockey Club. But what are the facts? Why, that one black ball is not, and never was, if the Jockey Club's own rules may be relied upon, sufficient to exclude; and that Col. Forester appears to have been elected to the Club in 1864, whereas Lord Glasgow did not die until March, 1869. In dealing with Lord Glasgow's horses, too, Mr. Custance should not have forgotten Musket, bred by Lord Glasgow, bequeathed to Mr. George Payne with the proviso "never to be sold," and consequently "leased for ninety-nine years" to the New Zealand Company, in whose hands he became the crack sire of the Antipodes, where Carbine and other sons of his carried all before them, and where Carbine alone won at least 25,000*l.* in stakes for his owner, Mr. D. S. Wallace.

By virtue of his volumes on 'Horse Racing in France' and on 'The Jockey Club,' Mr. Black has taken an assured place among the historians of the turf. His present work contains an immense amount of information in a small compass, and will be of much service to specialists, although often to the uninitiated his pages may seem little more than a mere list of names. Mr. Black does not dwell long on the early days of the turf and its heroes, the Byerley Turk, the Godolphin Arabian, and the Darley Arabian, but devotes most of his space, as his object necessitates his doing, to the Victorian era. We confess to not caring much for the period when the so-called "sport of kings" has become the business of blackguards, and to preferring to hark back to the eighteenth century, when some touch of romance is to be found in the feats of Flying Childers and Eclipse. They may not be all sober fact, but they have their interest. It is curious, too, to observe, on looking through Mr. Black's pages, how largely the Whigs monopolized racing in the reigns of George I. and George II., although neither of the monarchs took any interest in the turf. Of course there were exceptions. Bolingbroke, on his return from exile, kept racehorses; but the Jacobites, as a rule, remained on their estates and confined themselves to hunting, leaving Newmarket to the victorious faction. Mr. Black's remarks on the evils that attend racing in the present day, on gate-money meetings, betting, "bookies," and touts, are sensible and pertinent; and his volume may be warmly recommended, not merely for its conciseness, but for its accuracy.

NEW NOVELS.

The Common Ancestor. By John Hill. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

THERE is plenty of varied material in 'The Common Ancestor'; and the novel-readers of different types who peruse it will probably find something or other to their advantage, or at least amusement. To say that the story is devoid of padding would be untrue; but then what three-volume novel can be said to be entirely without it? Mr. Hill's opens with a scene in the Wellington Barracks presented with an air of reality and actuality. It seems a pity there is so little of it. The course of the story soon branches off to other scenes and persons of all sorts and conditions, and we hear no more of Tommy Atkins. Some of these people are not particularly entertaining and interesting, others are passably so. The author is at times rather aggravating in his way of cataloguing and labelling characters as though for action, and then doing little or nothing with them. Yet he manages to keep the thing going briskly enough. Villains and heroes, good women and others, do their parts fairly well, and their author does not exaggerate overmuch or set down aught in pure malice or gaiety of heart. One cannot complain that nothing happens, and there is at least one love affair for those who consider a novel incomplete without the introduction of more or less of the tender passion. The reader is left, too, with the understanding that another "affair" is coming on between a nice little girl and a good-humoured Irishman, not the least pleasant person in the group of those who share the ancestor. The latter, though he gives the book its title, does not appear in his true character till the finale is well under weigh. The book is not, perhaps, so exciting as the evident goodwill and intention of the author might have made it; but in spite of defects of style and faults of speech, such as the occasional misuse of a preposition, we have read many a worse novel, and so have other people.

The Romance of Shere Mote. By Percy Hulburd. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

'THE ROMANCE OF SHERE MOTE' is fair enough as a story of love and lunacy in an English countryside; but it has not the unity which is necessary for an ideal romance, and it is too laboriously built up to be well constructed. Mr. Hulburd cannot draw a villain; but unfortunately he tries to draw two or three, and, in despair at the incongruities which he recognizes in his own conceptions, he suddenly tells his readers (or so it strikes one) that it is useless to conceal the facts any longer—that the Lusted, father and son, are stark mad. They are not the only mad people in the book; and the good people are exceeding mild and domestic; and some of the incidents are crude and whimsical; and the three thick volumes form a somewhat vague medley of intended heroisms and abortive crimes; but, taken for all in all, this narrative is about as straightforward and entertaining a novel of love and lunacy as the unexacting reader need wish. If it just misses real strength and genuine romance, it is sufficiently well written to amuse an hour or two of leisure.

Tempe. By Constance Cotterell. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

THE author of 'Strange Gods' gave undoubted proofs of the possession of cleverness, and there is plenty of cleverness in Miss Cotterell's new venture, which is a most elaborate study of the type recently labelled as the "revolting daughter." Heroines are not always true to their catalogue of qualities; but Miss Cotterell certainly adheres to her description of Tempe as one who struck the outside world as "an inexplicable, not pretty, not ugly clever girl, a girl to be dreaded and kept at a distance." The problem of the novelist, we need hardly say, is to explain the attraction exerted by this fantastic character on her inner circle of intimates, and to enlist the allegiance of the reader. In this task Miss Cotterell has succeeded fairly well. The story of Tempe's long and perilous flirtation with Major Wainwright is detailed with a good deal of subtlety, and the sequel to the elopement forms an excellent piece of tragi-comedy. Tempe's escape from the results of her own folly is natural enough; but it is to be regretted that the author should have declined in the last chapter on so clumsily melodramatic a reunion between the heroine and her good genius, or that she should have thought it necessary to convert the major, who was ex hypothesi incorrigible. Miss Cotterell writes well, but her employment of colloquialisms amounts at times to an affectation.

The Tiger Lily: a Story of Two Passions. By G. Manville Fenn. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

THERE is more of the tiger and the ape in Mr. Fenn's last story than of the lily. Hot Italian blood, stabs in the back, the artist and his model, the nude and the crude, an adventuress sitting with veiled head to the painter whom she pursues, in order that he may annex a Juno's body to the face which he has already painted in secret—these are amongst the somewhat garish subjects and incidents of 'The Tiger Lily.' They will scarcely be so attractive to the author's friends as the wholesome stories of adventure to which he has accustomed them in the past. There is not much that is wholesome, or even true to life, in this melodrama of the "passions."

A Woman of Heart. By Thomas Terrell. 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

IT is related of the hero of Mr. Terrell's somewhat sordid romance that in his journalistic days he could write paragraphs not "better than any one else in the world, but better than any one else who would be prepared to accept the position of paragraph-writer on a small local paper." Mutatis mutandis, there is a good deal in this description which applies to Mr. Terrell's credentials as a novel-writer. 'A Woman of Heart' is almost entirely written in disjointed paragraphs, in a style which never once deviates into distinction or emerges from the pretentious commonplace of the descriptive reporter. Thus we are told of Mr. John Armitage that he was "armed with a vigorous constitution and an excellent presence"; and of the heroine's singing of a "light Spanish air," that "the song finished with a high note, which she brought out with a tremble, entrancing and delicious." Mr. Terrell's intermittent outbursts of unconscious humour occasionally enlighten the monotonous tawdriness of his novel, which is "respectfully dedicated" to those "who live in glass houses," and wages war on social conventionalities in such a spirit as to strengthen the hands of Mrs. Grundy.

Into Temptation. By A. Perrin. 2 vols. (White & Co.)

ANGLO-INDIAN society has furnished forth an abundance of novels during the last few years for the edification or amusement of the sober-minded people who stay at home, and have other occupations than the eternal pursuit of somebody else's husband or wife. In the wake of Mr. Kipling a whole host of writers have bethought themselves of the dramatic material afforded by the incidents or the scandals of station existence in our Eastern empire. 'Into Temptation' is another picture of the mischief bred by an idle life in a tropical climate amongst neighbours whose only interests are flirtation and gossip. The story of the young girl whose wits were brighter than her conscience, and who married a fractious middle-aged collector, without realizing exactly what obligations she was undertaking, is briskly told, and is distinguished rather by its manner than its matter. Josephine Boscawen tells her own story with much terseness. Her unvarnished tale never wanders from the point, and is often extremely graphic in consequence. The character sketches it contains are drawn with few strokes, but are all remarkably effective. The fact that the scenery and native life of her new home strike her so little, in comparison with the doings and sayings of the few and mostly undesirable English people she finds there, is in itself a trait showing uncommon observation of character. The heroine is left to shape her own existence at the end of the book, having proved herself, by means of certain sharp experiences, able to perceive the virtues of the narrow and strait gate, but not able to enjoy its thorns and discomforts.

Hetty's Heritage. By Noel Dene. 2 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

'HETTY'S HERITAGE' is quite a pretty story, told with a complete absence of all literary pretension. The mystery which hangs over Hetty's birth is one which is not unfrequently met with in fiction; her father's conduct, however, is of a baseness which the ordinary Mudie hero seldom equals.

The haughty relations and kind persons who respectively snubbed or befriended the young woman, supposed to be the house-keeper's niece, are described with moderation and are more or less lifelike. The book contains at least one piece of realism in the shape of a detailed description of the curriculum of the Royal College of Music, which may, perhaps, prove serviceable to a chance reader. The story is entirely harmless from every point of view other than a literary one. Its mild interest is sustained to the end, and it has the merit of not being spun out beyond the limits of its plot.

The Shibboleth. By Mrs. Vere Campbell. (Ward & Downey.)

A GOOD large volume, full of mysteries in small print, conveys dark or luminous suggestions of evil doings on the part of the principal characters in it, with an abundance of pantings, hissings, and curiings, or of "slow pregnant smiles" in the lighter moments of the lunatic heroine. Frankly, there is very little of human nature, or genuine tragedy, or comprehensible purposes in 'The Shibboleth.' The striving after effects which at best are purely theatrical is too obvious, and besides there are many unpleasant suggestions, and a number of general aphorisms, the most darkly incomprehensible of which sometimes stand at the head of a chapter. Here is one of them: "The Divine is dumb; sublimity bewails it, and the wailing is its own; but from Deep to Deep, signs flash; and the system of communion is in the unthinking, common, happy, wretched things of every day." This is truly a dark saying!

The Face of Death: a Westmoreland Story. By E. Vincent Briton. (Seeley & Co.)

SPITE of its gloomy title and ominous start Mr. Briton's tale emerges at the last into sunshine. The main motive—the conflict between will and heredity—is consistently kept before the reader and treated with a fair measure of skill and success, though the author is much happier in his dialogue and narrative than in the contrivance of incident. Sensation is not Mr. Briton's strong point, but he has a pretty gift of sentiment and a decided vein of gentle humour. The hero's sister, with her imperturbable gaiety, forms an excellent foil to her serious brother; the old nurse, Mrs. Pudsey, is an admirable specimen of a now almost obsolete type; and the exasperating vagaries of Sir Andrew Wyke, a modern Bluebeard of transcendent selfishness, are drawn with remorseless detail. Indeed, the reader has good grounds for serious dissatisfaction with Mr. Briton for his leniency towards this entirely detestable personage. Accepting as he does the principle of the happy ending, he ought really to have devised some refined yet appropriate punishment for the evil genius of the plot.

Implacable! Par Jean Barancy. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

Gladys. Par Hugues Le Roux. (Same publisher.)

WE have placed together the titles of two novels of much power, appealing to readers of very different inclinations. Novels "with a purpose" and "with a moral" are less common in France than among ourselves. Of such M. Barancy's is a good example. The characters are all substantial peasants, and the picture drawn of them is more flattering than that conveyed by Balzac's 'Les Paysans' or Zola's 'La Terre,' but is not untruthful. The love scenes display in the chief male actor that nobility of mind which, in dealing with such matters, modern French authors depict anywhere except among the rich or great.

If 'Gladys' had a moral, M. Paul Bourget has destroyed it in a critical note prefixed to the republication of this daring picture of modern love in the diplomatic world, which first appeared in a well-known review. The story of the successful attempt of a Parisian libertine on a great English lady is so told as to make the reader admire and pity the heroine; but the better drawn of the two characters is the hero, who, especially by making use of his mother to cover his intrigue, does not lead us to expect a better future for the couple than the man deserves.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

UNLIKE the tribes on the east coast of Africa, where one lingua franca, Swahili, carries the trader from Witu in the north to Cape Delgado in the south, the various nations that people the coast districts of Western Africa have all their separate languages, some of which are split up into dialects of considerable divergence. Even on the Gold Coast, and the broad belt inland from Aminee on the west to Lagos on the east, none of the four principal languages—Ga, Tshi, Ewe, Yoruba—has gained the ascendancy over any of the others. Col. A. B. Ellis, who in his official capacity has had long and close experience of the natives of the Gold and Slave coasts, after treating in two separate publications of "the Tshi-speaking peoples" of Ashante, and "the Ewe-speaking peoples" of Dahomey and other territories east of the Volta river, has now brought out the third volume of the series, entitled The Yoruba-Speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa (Chapman & Hall). He gives full details of their religion, rites, superstitions, customs, institutions, laws, folk-lore, and language, and states, as the result of a comparison between them and the Tshi and Ewe tribes, that the Yorubas are the highest in the social scale, and certainly the leading people in West Africa. The arguments by which he arrives at this conclusion are well worth perusal. We cannot bestow the same measure of praise on the appendix (pp. 305-402), which contains in tabular form a comparison of the Tshi, Ga, Ewe, and Yoruba languages, the three former of which belong to the Volta group, while the Yoruba is assigned to the Niger languages. Both groups, however, share with the Hausas the important peculiarity of words of the same sound being—as in Chinese and most Indo-Chinese languages—distinguished by the tones. The author, disregarding this essential characteristic, on which the leading authorities (Bishop Crowther, Christaller, Schön) have laid special emphasis, does not mark either the high tone with an acute, or the low tone with a grave accent, any more than he makes a distinction between open and close vowels. Thus the Yoruba root-words yé, to understand; yé, to praise; yè, to be alive; and yè, to go aside, are all written by him "ye." Similarly, the Ewe words dó, to sleep; dò, to inundate; dó, to kick; and dò, to be thick, appear all alike as "do." The same applies to many root-words in the Tshi and Ga columns. What would a Burmese scholar say if he were to find in a book laying pretence to scholarship the three words to, "to be short"; to, "to touch lightly"; and to, "to advance," written promiscuously! As many of the writer's remarks on the etymology of the four languages are sound and valuable, it is all the more to be regretted that he should have left untouched the question of the total distinction between homonymous words.

THE Catalogue of Sanskrit, Pali, and Prakrit Books in the British Museum, acquired during the Years 1876-92, which has just been issued by order of the Trustees, is a sequel to the late Dr. Haas's 'Catalogue of Sanskrit and Pali Books in the British Museum,' published in 1876, and as such conforms in principle and arrangement to its predecessor. It is the work of Prof. C. Bendall, Senior Assistant in the Department of Oriental Printed Books and MSS., and reflects equal credit on the desire of the authorities to keep the national library abreast of modern publications in those branches of Eastern literature, and on the learning and accuracy of the Oriental scholar who has had charge of the compilation. It goes without saying that the two great collections of Sanskrit books, the one in the British Museum and the other in the India Office, will be found to contain together nearly every printed book in and on that language; but pending the cataloguing of the latter collection, students will have to resort to the two quarters of the British Museum catalogue for trustworthy information on any Sanskrit publications they may be in search of. We mean, however, no disparagement to the present compiler when we give it as our deliberate opinion that much space and expense would have been saved by a simple transliteration of the Oriental words. So far as we can see, no practically useful end has been served by giving the titles in the characters in which the original is printed, be they Devanagari, Bengali, Telugu, Canarese, Malayalam, Sinhalese, or Burmese. The titles of works in Grantha characters appear in Romanized form only, no Grantha type having been available in the office in which the catalogue was printed; but no one, we venture to say, will find that the description of those particular books would have gained by the addition of the Grantha titles. Ex uno disce omnes. We have also noticed many misprints in the words in less familiar Dravidian type. As for the Burmese type, it would have been an absolute gain to the work if it had been dispensed with altogether in the description of Pali books. With all this, the catalogue is an invaluable book of reference, and the pains which Prof. Bendall has bestowed on making it still more useful by cross-references, an index of titles, and a select subject-index are beyond all praise.

To those Oriental students whose tastes are rather literary than grammatical, and who prefer coming as soon as possible to the illustration of rules in books to lingering among the rules themselves, the Grammar of the Bengali Language, Literary and Colloquial (Oxford, Clarendon Press), by Mr. John Beames of the Bengal Civil Service, will perhaps prove as acceptable as to those "who desire to understand the spoken language," for whom it appears to have been mainly designed. The first half of this bright little volume should not, in any case, be hurriedly passed over. If its opening chapter be thoroughly apprehended and graven on the memory, and the remainder, up to the penultimate section of the sixth chapter, be carefully studied and considered, the "Structure of Sentences," which inaugurates the second half, will be a comparatively genial task, after which the literary student may fairly revel in "Specimens of Bengali Literature." We may well congratulate the author of this late issue of the Clarendon Press "Oriental Series" on the good work done in producing a volume of such practical utility, and so likely to meet the approval of students of Indian languages generally—notably members of the Indian services.

MR. FREDERICK DE PRÆTHORSTON'S Memoratory Arabic Text and Glossary (Allen & Co.) is an admirably printed little volume, and should prove useful to the English student who would learn something of book-lore as well as the spoken language of the lazar in modern Egypt. Although the extracts given are few and brief, they are significant in their way, and render ample justice to the more eloquent diction of the Kuran, from which they are all taken. The passage selected from the second chapter (that of "The Cow") is the one stated by Sale to be "a magnificent description of the Divine Majesty and Providence," the translation of which must not be supposed to attain "the dignity of the original." He adds: "justly admired by the Mohammedans, who recite it in their prayers.....some of them wear it about their neck, engraved on an agate or other precious stone."

UNDER the auspices of the Clarendon Press Mr. St. Andrew St. John has brought out a Burmese Reader, designed for the use of Civil Service students and others who may wish to acquire the language quickly and thoroughly. It is believed—and, we think, rightly—that this book will supply a want. The first part deals with the alphabet and pronunciation, the parts of speech, and syntax; the second part consists of a series of short stories—easy in style, but rich in their vocabulary—known as the 'Sudhammacari,' conveniently arranged for purposes of translation, and supplemented, story by story, with explanatory notes. Two other parts complete the volume: one comprising a number of more advanced selections from Burmese literature, and the other furnishing the student with samples of Burmese newspaper paragraphs, as well as of petitions, depositions, and other official documents. The typography is beautiful; and the volume is, in our opinion, well calculated to meet the purposes for which it has been put together. We may also hazard the opinion that the work will be welcomed by those whose interest in Burmese is that of the student of comparative philology; who look upon the language as monosyllabic, akin to Chinese, having the power of forming conglomerate compound words—as one, in fact, of a group of languages spoken in Indo-China, and possessing certain primitive characteristics. From such a book as this the philologist will be able after a few hours' study to glean much of what for his special purposes he requires to know.

Philostrati Maioris Imagines. Recensuerunt Seminariorum Vindobonensium Sodales. (Leipzig, Teubner.)—This useful addition to the Teubner series might provide our university reformers with matter for reflection. The book has been prepared by nineteen students of Vienna University under the guidance of Profs. Benndorf and Schenkl, and was one of the presents to the scholars who met at the brilliantly successful "Philologenversammlung" held last Whitsuntide at Vienna. The character of the work done will explain sufficiently why American scholars in search of knowledge and training turn to Berlin and Vienna rather than to Oxford and Cambridge, where the energies of teachers and undergraduates are absorbed in preparing for a written examination. Of the sixty-six MSS. of Philostratus scattered through the libraries of Europe, seventeen have been collated, and twenty-six inspected, for this edition. Some were sent to Vienna, e.g., from Venice and Leyden; some were investigated by travelling students; for the readings of others the "sodales" return thanks to "viri docti" of various nationalities. The result reached is that though a convincing pedigree cannot be established for all the MSS., two stand out superior to the rest: F at Paris, and P at Florence. F, sec. XIII., is the more valuable, and all its readings are recorded; P, sec. XIV., is marred by bad corrections, so that attention is paid only to the first hand; the others are quoted occasionally, when their divergencies present some feature of interest or importance. The editors suggest that the two principal families of the MSS. go back as far as the sixth century A.D., and that the archetype was derived from a copy used by Philostratus for recitations; but the evidence is totally inadequate to prove these conjectures. The constitution of the text was entrusted to a committee of seven under professorial supervision. In addition to the contributions from periodical literature, which has been ransacked with German conscientiousness, some unpublished notes by C. Valckenauer and by Reiske ("immortalis memoris") have been secured from Leyden and Copenhagen; valuable emendations have been sent by E. Rohde and K. Diltthey; and Prof. Benndorf has written many terse archaeological notes to explain and defend the readings adopted. The crown of the work is an exhaustive index of 127 pp., which includes the 'Imagines' of Philostratus Minor and the 'Descriptiones' of Callistratus, and, taken in connexion with the new volume of Schmid's 'Atticismus,' will assist the critic to an understanding of the very peculiar syntax and vocabulary of a style which appeared to the younger Philostratus "highly Attic." The archaeologist will be grateful for a sketch of the literature on Philostratus since 1881, and for an elaborate table of references to the works in which Friedrichs, Brunn, Matz, and Kalkmann have discussed the pictures which Philostratus describes or pretends to describe. This text will supersede Kayser so far as the 'Imagines' are concerned, but we have still to wait for the general edition of the Philostrati projected by Sturm.

WE have received from the Pitt Press a collection of Latin and Greek Verse, by the late Canon T. S. Evans, with a memoir by his son-in-law, Dr. Waite, formerly Master of University College, Durham. The volume is a pleasant record of a quaint and interesting personality, and contains many masterpieces in an art which will soon be as rare as that of engraving in mezzotint. The scholar whom Rugbeians used to call "Tom" Evans, to distinguish him from his colleague "Charlie" Evans, had the misfortune to be born three centuries too late. He might have achieved the same reputation as Buchanan, or Casaubon, or Vossius, in the days when Euclid and algebra were barely known, and criticism had not dared to touch the Holy Scriptures. No one who had his acquaintance could fail to respect his character and to admire his talents; but he was an "ineffectual angel" and he knew it, so he seldom attempted to beat his wings. A valuable, but somewhat eccentric edition of the First Epistle to the Corinthians conveys his only message. Besides this, he printed 'The Agnostic in the Hayfield,' a humorous piece, greatly prized by the few who possess it; a translation of Tennyson's 'Enone' in Latin hexameters; and several compositions in 'Arundines Cami' and 'Sabrinæ Corolla.' Many more of his verses were circulated in manuscript, and have been familiar in classical schools for the last thirty years. Some of these, which are now printed for the first time, might have been omitted to make room for 'The Agnostic in the Hayfield.' As a composer Canon Evans shone, we think, more in Latin than in Greek, and in hexameters more than in any other Latin metre. His Greek iambs are wonderfully close translations, but not much like the iambs of a Greek tragedy. In Latin hexameters, on the other hand, whether he imitated Lucretius or Virgil, he moved freely, almost as if Latin were more familiar to him than English. In other metres he is highly ingenious, but not so thoroughly Latin. The following version of 'The Isles of Greece' is a tour de force which is new to us:—

Cyclades Ægei stellæ maris insuleque Græcæ,
Phœbus Sappho qua canebat ardua,
Libera militiæ cunctula munerumque pacis,
Qua Delos orta est Deliusque Phœbus!

Perpetui soles ridet tibi fulgillum : sed extra Soles nihil non cœdit Pelagiis.
Monte te Marathon, Marathon mare tu quoque intueris :
Ille per horam solus utroam
Dum mecum meditor, nihil Græcia visa post tot annos
Exire longam posse civitatem.
Bellæ hæc poteram, Fœvæ pede dum premo aspalto, Futuro me sic esse cum cœtera.
Quæ Salamini mari gentium super lamine tuctur,
In arce rupis rex sedebat altius
Mille mari clæsse per litora, mille nationes
U'no minores rege subnectant.
Ille recensabat numerum albi prodeunte Phœbo :
Cadente, quoniam tanta vis virorum ?

This is clever, but the translations from Milton, which are well known and not easy to cite, are natural. The editor admits that in the Latin pieces there are two doubtful constructions, but there are a good many more slips than two. Who, for instance, could explain tibi in l. 5 of the specimen just given ? It remains to be said that the memoir prefixed to this volume is well written and admirably proportioned. Among many good stories, it contains one that is especially pretty :—

"Once when he was sitting in the class-room at Rugby to superintend a mathematical examination, some of the boys were engaged on a Trigonometry paper, and one of them, called Tawney, well knowing Mr. Evans's innocence of the subject, went up and asked him whether in one of the papers set had not been printed for cos. Mr. Evans, catching the situation at a glance, said audibly : 'Well, Tawney, there is spærris and spæstiv, værris and væstiv, and so on. But, to go no further than your own name, there is Tawney and Sawney. Possibly there is no great difference.'"

SHORT STORIES.

Two Offenders. By Ouida. (Chatto & Windus.)—Ouida dedicates her new work to the memory of the late M. de Maupassant. Her English is not, perhaps, equal to his French ; but setting aside the form, his spirit seems to have certainly been present at the birth of these two stories. Both are thoroughly imbued with the notion that pervades all his books, that no man having power or wealth is likely ever to use either for any but a selfish or brutal end, while those who, having neither, have once in their lives done an unselfish action, can never feel either the gratification of content or the joy of having acted "altruistically." In the first story an old and forgotten artist in Paris is offered lodging and shelter in an institution provided to meet such cases. The person who gives the nomination is, of course, purseproud and overbearing ; the artist, who has lost his hand and cannot work, has an illegitimate grandson and a dog, whom he would rather see starve in his own society than thrive elsewhere. At last, when it is represented to him that a little more privation will kill the child, the old gentleman agrees to part with him, and to enter the institution. When there he behaves in such an ill-conditioned fashion, bullying the attendants and grumbling at large, that all sympathy the reader might have for him is destroyed. Ultimately he shoots his little dog, and dies himself. The purseproud benefactor comes out better than he really had any call to do, and one feels that the grandson may have a chance of turning out a decent fellow. The scene of the second story is laid in Italy. It is unpleasant, and altogether the book should be widely read, as showing what the "realistic" short story is apt to be when stripped of what is, after all, to most English readers—even Mr. Roland's subscribers—the obscurity of a foreign tongue.

Those who know Maxwell Gray principally as the author of 'The Silence of Dean Maitland' may be surprised to find her in An Innocent Impostor, and other Stories (Kegan Paul & Co.), tackling the short story on amusing and pleasing lines. 'An Innocent Impostor,' a gay little episode à quatre, bordering on genuine farce, is not without human and humorous touches. 'A Glass of Water' deals with a yet funnier, if more probable chapter of accidents ; but both are dependent on situations pushed to exaggeration. Likewise 'The Hansom Cabman,' which runs with brightness and vivacity. 'A Roland for an Oliver,' also a funny idea, is less amusingly worked. It tells how a couple of daring young people assumed fictitious names and personalities, and ended their harmless mystification by a happy marriage. 'The Mysterious Guide' is a thrilling Alpine adventure, in which a party set forth at night, to discover—by the light of day, and at a most critical moment in their roped-in climb—that the supposed slouch-hatted guide who goes first is the lunatic lover of the lady mountaineer, and that his intentions are murderous. The rest of the stories are more sentimental in kind ; but their end is not total despair. We have said enough to show that the author is to be congratulated on being able thus to display to the public a new and unexpected side of her cleverness.

OWN LIBRARY TABLE.

My Study Fire and Under the Trees, by Hamilton Wright Mabie (Dent & Co.), a couple of volumes by an American writer, contain a number of tiny essays, or papers of the nature of essays. The study fire and the voices of the trees are supposed to be an undertone to all the reflections. They slip along in pleasant places by quiet waters, and the American spelling—the only outwardly American thing about them—scarcely disturbs the attitude of calm and thoughtful repose. A rather too self-conscious air of "cultured simplicity" is apparent, as well as the influence of thinkers like Thoreau and Walden rounded by the Wordsworthian tradition. If the "elegant preparation" is not to lose its tonic properties, we should advise that the volumes be taken in sips rather than in draughts. These miniature essays and short excursions in thoughtland, all in the interest of a fuller communion with nature and a more perfect comradeship with books, show delicacy of perception and freshness of handling. Lovers of both will find fruitful suggestions and happy turns of expression, though a certain sameness in the intellectual horizon is a little monotonous. Mr. Mabie views authorship from a wide and generous standpoint, and is appreciative of the true "best" in many writers. Sometimes he is a little obvious, and his attitude towards nature, of which he has so much to say, seems to us extremely trained and prepared, and lacking in real spontaneity and original divination. Yet he is a devout lover of natural objects. "Books and nature," he truly says somewhere, "mutually interpret each other ; only he who stands where the double light falls sees things in the perspective ;" "one needs," he adds, "preparation for the sanctities and solemnities of the woods." These remarks may be said to be the key-note of his mood, and it is on it we find him just a little too insistent and mannered, especially with regard to our "primeval kinship with nature," which one would like to see rather more taken for granted. What he urges against the modern gospel of despair and disillusion is by no means the worst thing in the volumes.

MR. JAMES SAMUELSON'S book on Greece: her Present Condition and Recent Progress, is called "perfunctory" by the author, and is singularly inferior to his excellent monographs on 'Roumania' and 'Bulgaria.' It is published by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.

We welcome the appearance of the volume for 1894 of that well-known work of reference Debrett's House of Commons (Dean & Son). It is not entirely free from printers' errors, but they are not, as a rule, important. Some of them are repeated from year to year, as, for example, "Egerton of Trafton" for Egerton of Tilton, at p. 22. We have had to notice in all works of reference with regard to the House of Commons a considerable amount of variation and uncertainty as to the figures given for the electorate of the various constituencies. In 'Debrett' of last year the electors of Cork for 1893 were stated at 13,974. In 'Debrett' of the present year the numbers for 1894 are not given, and the numbers for 1893 are repeated from the edition of last year. But in the official return the number last year is given as 13,660. The return for the present year is not yet out. The number of electors for the Isle of Wight was given by 'Debrett' last year for 1893 as 15,604. It is this year given both for 1893 and for 1894, and the number for 1893 is this year stated as having been 13,291, which is correct. We do not know how the curious mistake of last year was arrived at. The number of electors for Londonderry was given last year in 'Debrett' as 4,185 for 1893, and is this year set at the same figure for 1893. The official return gives 4,052. A praiseworthy attempt is made each year by 'Debrett' to give late figures, no doubt by correspondence with the returning officers ; but the result is disappointing, as in the most important cases—those of very large and rapidly increasing constituencies like South Essex, where figures are of real importance—those of 1894 are not given, doubtless from the answers not having been received in time. The result is that Cardiff appears at first sight from 'Debrett' to be leading in the race, although we understand that the Romford division of Essex still, in fact, keeps ahead in 1894, and continues to be the most considerable of the constituencies of the United Kingdom. In the account of the East Worcestershire election an error made last year is repeated, and Mr. Oscar Browning will continue, to his astonishment, to find himself described as a Conservative.

Kelly's Handbook to the Titled, Landed, and Official Classes for 1894 is thoroughly kept up to date, and there is nothing new to be said about it. We have frequently expressed our opinion that this is one of the most useful of all existing books of reference.

Bourne's Handy Assurance Directory, now edited by Mr. W. Schooling, is a useful and trustworthy manual.

Ferguson's Ceylon Handbook and Directory is a meritorious production which we have praised on previous occasions, and which continues to deserve praise. It is published at Colombo by Messrs. A. M. & J. Ferguson, and in London by Messrs. Haddon & Co., Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co., and Messrs. Street & Co. The volume forms a bulky and complete view of the colony, its trade and industries.

MORE than a dozen years ago Messrs. Marcus Ward & Co. issued, under the title of "The New Plutarch," a series of biographies : 'Haroun Alraschid,' by the late Prof. Palmer ; 'Sir John Franklin,' by Mr. A. H. Bealey ; 'Martin Luther,' by Mr. Treadwell (an American) ; 'Coligny,' by Mr. Walter Besant, &c. The series was edited by Mr. Besant and the Rev. W. J. Brodribb. Messrs. Ward & Co. are now reissuing these books under the name of 'Heroes of History,' and the title-pages are dated 1894 ; and there is no indication that we can discover that the volumes have appeared before. We do not suppose that Mr. Brodribb or Mr. Besant, who since 'The New Plutarch' ceased to appear has laboured zealously to raise the morality of publishers, is at all aware that his name is being used to pass off old books for new ; but it is only fair to call their attention to what is being done, and to warn the public against taking the "Heroes of History" for a new set of books.

Donald Ross of Heimra is the latest addition to Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.'s handy reissue of Mr. Black's romances. The same active publishers send us convenient reprints of Cripples the Currier, by Mr. Blackmore, and Adda Cathcart, by Dr. George Mac Donald.—Messrs. Jarrold & Sons send us a second edition of His Heart to Win, by Curtis Yorke.

We have received the reports of the Free Libraries at Belfast, Brighton, Clapham, Clerkenwell, and Cheltenham. The tone of them all is cheerful. It may be remarked that at Brighton the fine weather has proved injurious to reading, and at Clorkenwell the readers are now allowed direct access to the shelves.—From Cardiff we have received an excellent Catalogue of Books in the Central Lending Library (Manchester, Heywood); from Leicester an instructive Catalogue of the Books, Pamphlets, &c., relating to Leicestershire (Leicester, Thornley & Warren); from Nottingham a Catalogue of the Special Exhibition of Works by Reuben Bussey (Nottingham, Sands).

We have on our table Glimpses of Welsh Life and Character, by Mary Trevelyan (Hogg),—P. Vergili Maronis Aeneidos, Liber III., edited by P. Sandford (Simpkin),—Schiller's Song of the Bell, and other Poems, edited, with Notes, by G. Macdonald (Blackie),—Blackie's Junior School Shakespeare: Coriolanus, with Introduction and Notes by W. Dent (Blackie),—Twelve Years' Queen's Scholarship Questions, 1880-91, with Answers to Arithmetic, Algebra, &c. (Moffatt & Paige),—The Civilization of Christendom, and other Studies, by B. Bosanquet (Sonnenschein),—The Ethics of Hegel, by J. M. Sterrett, D.D. (Boston, U.S., Ginn),—The Pursuit of Happiness, by D. G. Brinton, M.D. (Philadelphia, U.S., McKay),—The Elements of Hypnotism, by R. H. Vincent (Kegan Paul),—The Clairvoyance of Beattie Williams, edited by Florence Marryat (Bliss, Sands & Foster),—Words to Mothers (S.P.C.K.),—Archæologia Oxoniensis, Part III. (Frowde),—Life and Labour of the People in London, by C. Booth (Royal Statistical Society),—Myxædema, by A. M. Wilson, M.D. (Scientific Press),—The Hygienic Prevention of Consumption, by J. E. Squire, M.D. (Griffin),—What's the World Coming To? by W. G. Moffatt and J. White (Stock),—St. Wynfrith and its Inmates, by E. Everett-Green (Jarrold),—Doing and Daring, by E. Stredder (Nelson),—Rose Morton, by L. Drury (Dean),—Woman and the Man, by R. Buchanan, 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus),—Among Boers and Bantus, by Mrs. Barkly (Remington & Co.),—One of Us, by O. Schublin (New York, Collier),—A National Disaster, and other Stories, by Deesborough (Simpkin),—An Army Doctor's Romance, by Grant Allen (Tuck),—The Beginning and End of Mary Jones, by A. Irvine (Simpkin),—The Design of Love, by E. B. (Stoneman),—The Religion of a Literary Man, by Richard Le Gallienne (Mathews & Lane),—I and Myself, and other Poems, by N. F. Layard (Simpkin),—Elizabeth Stuart, a Dramatic Sketch, by W. E. Windus (Freshwater, Gubbins),—and The Children in the Wood, by Miss Corner and J. V. Barret (Dean). Among New Editions we have Yusuf the Guide, by G. M. Fenn (Blackie),—Sterre Brown's Bunyip, and other Stories, by J. A. Barry (Remington),—Sketches of Natural History, by M. Howitt (Nelson),—The Life and Duties of the Citizen, by J. E. Parrott, First Course (Allen),—and The Beauties of Nature, by Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M.P. (Macmillan).

YORKSHIRE SCHOOLS.

February 10, 1894.

PLEASE correct an error I made last week. The old trials took place October 30th and 31st, 1823, and not 23rd and 24th October as I stated. There is in last Saturday's (February 17th) Newcastle Weekly Chronicle a condensed report of these trials, but it only gives the plaintiffs' case, nearly the whole of the evidence for the defence being omitted. In this condensed report no mention is made of the fact that the schoolmaster nearly lost his own sight, nor is the fact mentioned that one of the specialists in "ophthalmia," retained for the plaintiff, complained that he had not been informed that Wm. Jones had suffered from a severe attack of small-pox before going to the school. In this report many of the little charges against the schoolmaster loom up very largely, although most of them were explained away at the time of the trials; such, for instance, as the sleeping on hay and straw, which was shown to be chaff beds and straw mattresses. The charge that the boys had no tea was disposed of by showing that they had milk in place of it, and the disgraceful feeding of boys on oatmeal needs no defence to-day even in London. Milk and oatmeal are now considered more nourishing than tooth-destroying white bread and tannic acid, commonly called tea. The skill with which the solicitor or barrister had got up the plaintiffs' case is evident in every line of the old trials, which did not take place until two years and a half after the eye disease had been in the school. This gave plenty of time to arrange every bit of carelessness in such a manner as to make it appear terrible. There is no trace in the original report of any villainy on the part of the master; but there is great trace of his grief at the affliction from which both he and his pupils had suffered. He was ruined by these trials, and asked for time in which to pay the damages. It was at once acceded to by both Jones and Ockerby (the plaintiffs), and out of his mortgaged future he paid every penny of the 600l. In reading these curtailed reports of the trials it should be clearly kept in mind that he was a sufferer himself; that the damages and costs of these trials were great; that he had spent 400 guineas in medical attendance; that his school was ruined for a time by them; that both by word of mouth and through his counsel he expressed the deepest regret and sorrow that such affliction should have fallen upon his pupils; and that the disease was most probably caused by the small-pox patient (Wm. Jones). When all these points in the schoolmaster's favour are taken into consideration, surely he had been punished enough for any carelessness or errors of judgment of which he had been guilty, without branding him sixteen years afterwards as (what he most certainly was the very opposite of) a villain. JACKMAN.

YOUR correspondent Mr. G. H. Powell (ante, p. 213) is right in stating that there is an allusion to Yorkshire schools in one of Foote's plays. The allusion, however, is not in 'The Minor,' but in 'The Liar,' the date of which is, I believe, 1762. In the first act, near the beginning, Papillon says to Young Wilding: "Why then you are to know, Sir, that my former situation has been rather above my present condition, having once sustained the dignity of sub-preceptor to one of those cheap rural academies with which our county of York is so plentifully stock'd."

Mr. Wackford Squeers's advertisement of Dotheboys Hall, given in chap. iv. of 'Nicholas Nickleby,' is, perhaps, best illustrated by the following passage in No. 123 of the Connoisseur, June 3rd, 1756 :—

"We may suppose, that she took a fancy to that pretty babe, while in the country, and brought it up to town with her, in order to place it here : as she did a few years ago to another charming boy ; which, being too old to be got into this Hospital, is now at a school in Yorkshire, where young gentlemen are boarded, clothed [sic], and educated, and found in all necessaries, for ten pounds a year."

F. C. BIRKBECK TERRY.

2, Thanet Place, Strand, Feb. 16, 1894.

My reference should have been to 'The Lyar,' Act I. sc. i., where Papillion (recounting his rascally adventures) observes to Young Wilding : "Why then you are to know, Sir, that my former situation has been rather above my present condition, having once sustained the dignity of sub-preceptor to one of those cheap rural academies with which our county of York is so plentifully stocked." G. H. POWELL.

I AM obliged to Jacmar for giving the dates of the trials. Perhaps some correspondent will now be able to give some of the details as reported in the Times. There is no mention of Yorkshire schools in 'The Minor.' J. D.

DR. JOWETT'S MOTHER.

THE Rev. W. H. Langhorne writes on the 20th inst. :—

"I have been applied to to-day, for the seventh or eighth time, for particulars about the mother of the late Master of Balliol, who was of my father's kin, and I am collecting and verifying such information as I possess or may acquire concerning her, which will be sent in due time to the editors of Dr. Jowett's forthcoming 'Life,' namely, Mr. Evelyn Abbott, of Balliol, and Prof. Lewis Campbell. In the mean time, will you kindly allow me to say that the late Master of Balliol's mother was Isabella Langhorne, and that he told me that she had told him that she was the grand-niece of the poet Langhorne, who, with his brother, gave 'Plutarch's Lives' to the world—Dryden's translation, which was not, however, his work, not being satisfactory. The marriage (by licence) of Benjamin Jowett with Isabella Langhorne took place at old Camberwell Church (St. Giles)—destroyed by fire just fifty years ago—on the 22nd of September, 1814; and the late Master of Balliol, the second child, was baptized in the same church on the 16th of May, 1817. These facts have been verified for me by the Rev. F. F. Kelly, Vicar of Camberwell. For further details, more hereafter."

ACTS II. 9.

It may be owing to dulness of apprehension, but I fail to see why your correspondent, remarking on the above-noted passage in the New Testament, should infer that by the word "Judea" the "multitude must have meant some distant country beyond Mesopotamia." The question, "Are not all these which speak Gulileans?" is one of language and dialect. Both Judea and Samaria might have been cited, in this respect, as differing from Galilee; for though the language of every-day life of the Jews under Rome may have been, in a general sense, Aramaic and Greek, such a state of things does not affect the existence of local forms of speech. Irrespective of Judea, Mesopotamia, and the wide term "Asia" (which might well imply other parts of Asia Minor than those named), the three verses bearing upon the case (9, 10, 11) mention twelve distinct localities which radiate, as it were, from Palestine, the central point. Of these, Media, Parthia, and Elam indicate the Persian dominions on the east; Phrygia, Pamphylia, Cappadocia, and Pontus represent the Asiatic seats of Greek or Roman influence on the north; Arabia, Egypt, Libya, and Cyrene are the more notable tracts on the south, stretching westward along the African coast; while Crete (if really Candia) is significant of the nearer islands on the west, of which we hear further in the narrative of St. Paul. Why, then, need we bring Ayodhya, or any more remote place than Judea itself, to take up a position between Mesopotamia and Cappadocia, to which it has no better geographical claim?

From the following account of the miracle of the Tongues, found in a curious old publication of the first half of the sixteenth century, 'La Mer des Histoires,' there appears to have been a tradition that St. James spoke the "Judaic" dialect: "Cost assavoir que par le don du Saint Esperit chascun apostre fut instruct a parler selon le langage de la nation a laquelle il devoit estre envoie pour prescher, come Saint Pierre parloit latin, Saint Johan grec, Saint Jacques judaïque, Saint Thomas ethiopique, et ainsi des autres." Whether the theory that "the gift of unlearned languages was designed to help the Apostles in their future preaching" is universally accepted at the present day, or otherwise (the words quoted are from Dr. Farrar's 'Life of St. Paul'), we need not here discuss. But I may venture to recall Dr. Doddridge's once familiar paraphrase of the Scriptural text as putting forth a plain exposition pertinent to the whole subject under consideration :—

"Are not all these that speak, by Birth and Country, Galileans? And how then do we every one of us hear them, as they direct their Speech to so many different People, who are here come together out of so many Nations, speaking to each of us in his own native Language? For while there are among us Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites or Persians; and those that inhabit Mesopotamia; and those that dwell too in Judea, where the Dialect is so different from that of Galilee, and likewise the Natives of Cappadocia and Pontus, and of the Country more properly called the proconular Asia; as well as the Inhabitants of the neighbouring Provinces of Phrygia and Pamphylia, of Egypt, and the Parts of Africa which are about Cyrene, and the many Sojourners in this City (who are) Romans, some of us native Jews, and others of us Proselytes to the Mosaic Religion; together with those of both these Sorts who use the language of Crete, and those who are Arabians; we do everyone of us hear them speaking in our own native Tongues the wonderful Works of God....."

Surely, notwithstanding etymological affinity, neither Siam nor Oude is here wanting to complete the roll of the countries or nationalities specified.

THE MIDDLEMAN.

New York, Jan. 30, 1894.

THERE are one or two points in connexion with the literary agent, or middleman between author and publisher, which I think have been missed by your previous correspondents, possibly because they are more particularly applicable to the American than to the English publishing business.

The most important point, so far as the author is concerned, is that the employment of a literary agent is likely to lead to the distribution of his books among a number of publishers. Now in this country the influence of advertising on the sale of books is chiefly a cumulative one, and a publisher spends his money not so much in advertising a particular book as in keeping the name of an author by whom he is employed constantly before the public. He will naturally do this more vigorously for an author all of whose books he controls than for a writer in the sale of whose works he is only partially interested; and an author who has employed two or three different publishers may be annoyed, but must not be surprised, if he finds that his books do not figure conspicuously in the advertising lists of any one of them.

I could give you examples from my own experience of the disadvantage of this distribution of interests. A recent case is that of a writer whose books, saleable as they are, command in advance payments on royalties about one-third less to-day than they did three years ago, when they were all in one publisher's hands, although, of course, on the first book which was not brought out by his original publisher the author received a larger sum than he had hitherto done.

Another serious evil is the temptation which the literary agent has to accept on behalf of the author an offer for publication from a firm of small financial responsibility, so that, while the first payment on account of his book may be met, the author may find as the second or third year of publication comes round that the firm in question has made an assignment, and that his book has passed into the hands of the receiver of the failed company.

I was lately offered a book by a rising English author, whose books have had a fair sale hitherto, but the terms asked (and evidently suggested) by the literary agent were such as afforded no chance of profit to the publisher. The book was declined, and was finally issued by a firm of publishers who have already failed once, and who, if current report is to be believed, are likely to go through the same experience again at no distant date.

It is, perhaps, more important for an author here to make himself acquainted with the ability and responsibility of his publisher than it is in London. There are on this side of the water a number of publishing houses, both of English antecedents and of native origin, whose honour and financial responsibility have never been questioned, and it is, therefore, both surprising and irritating to find so many English authors of note falling (no doubt with the aid of the middleman) into the hands of firms such as those that have recently helped to swell the list of failures at "Bradstreet's."

AN AMERICAN PUBLISHER.

MR. H. BICKNELL.

MR. HERMAN K. BICKNELL has written to us from Cairo :—

"I trust I shall not be reopening a controversy already closed if, as Mr. Herman Bicknell's only son, I enter a word of protest against Col. Jackson's remarks in your issue of December 16th. I have only just received the correspondence, or I should have written earlier. I do not desire to mention the Mecca pilgrimage—I consider my uncle, Mr. Sidney Bicknell, has fully dealt with that question; I merely wish to refute the absolutely false statement that my father was in any sense of the word 'a renegade Christian.' Far from it, his great pride in life was that he was a Catholic; and I am sure there are many who knew him, and especially at Ramsgate where he lived, who would willingly bear testimony to the truth of his religious convictions. Only a week ago I met an old dragoon—Asaad Smart—employed by my father twenty-four years ago, and he told me he well remembered Mr. Bicknell once saying to him: 'You know, Smart, I have had experience of a good many religions, and, believe me, the only one that offers any consolations is the Catholic one.' Col. Jackson may consider it in good taste to employ opprobrious epithets in writing of a dead comrade; but, fortunately, it is easy on this occasion to prove how untrue they are. I may add that my father was attended in his last moments by Father Christie, of Farm Street, and Father White, who, I believe, is now in charge of the Catholic mission at Brook Green."

NOTES ON WORDSWORTH.

Dublin, February, 1894.

IN the 'Note on Coleridge' printed in the Athenæum, January 27th, Coleridge's obligation to Bartram's 'Travels' is shown with reference to the design of 'The Wanderings of Cain.' In the Athenæum review of the "Aldine" 'Wordsworth' the obligations to Bartram of Wordsworth in his 'Ruth' are pointed out. Readers of Wordsworth have been surprised by the collocation of the words "pulse" and "machine" in the well-known lines :—

And now I see with eyes serene
The very pulse of the machine.

It may be worth noting that a like collocation occurs in Bartram: "At the return of the morning, by the powerful influence of light, the pulse of nature becomes more active, and the universal vibration of life insensibly and irresistibly moves the wondrous machine" (p. 177, Dublin, ed. 1793).

To another book of travels in America, Capt. Jonathan Carver's 'Travels, Wordsworth, in a note appended to the poem 'To H. O. [Hartley Coleridge] Six Years Old' in the volumes of 1807—a note subsequently omitted—acknowledges a debt; but Carver's words have not been quoted in illustration of Wordsworth's poem. Wordsworth writes:—

Thou fairy voyager! that dost float
In such clear water, that thy boat
May rather seem
To broil on air than on an earthly stream;
Suspended in a stream as clear as sky,
Where earth and heaven do make one imagery.

And Carver (in his description of Lake Superior):—

"The water in general appeared to be on a bed of rocks. When it was calm, and the sun shone bright, I could sit in my canoe, where the depth was upward of six fathoms, and plainly see huge piles of stone at the bottom, of different shapes, some of which appeared as if they were hewn. The water at this time was pure and transparent as air; and my canoe seemed as if it hung suspended in that element."—Pp. 132, 133, ed. 1781.

The "Mucowiss," as a name for the "whip-poor-will" in 'The Excursion,' bk. iii., is doubtless derived from Carver. To yet another volume of American travels, Hearne's 'Journey,' Wordsworth was indebted for the suggestion of his 'Complaint of a Forsaken Indian Woman.' Both Bartram and Carver were of service to Southey when writing his 'Madoc.'

EDWARD DOWDEN.

THE PEDIGREE OF THE AUTHOR OF 'THE SEASONS.'

A GOOD many years ago a paper in the Quarterly Review hinted the connexion of Thomson, the poet of 'The Seasons,' with the Scottish house of Home. The paper may have been inspired by Miss Elizabeth Bell, daughter of the Rev. James Bell, D.D., minister of Coldstream, and granddaughter of Lizzie, the favourite sister of the poet. Lizzie was the wife of the Rev. Robert Bell, minister of Strathaven. However this may be, it is certain that the subject of the article in the Quarterly greatly interested Miss Bell, who made a communication to the last Earl of Home on the matter in question. What correspondence ensued, if any, has not been made public, and there the matter seems to have rested till now, when, interest in the subject having again awakened, search for Miss Bell's communication was made at the suggestion of the Rev. Dr. Mair, of Southdean, probably the best living authority on the life of Thomson, and within the last few days the aforesaid communication has been discovered at The Hirsal, in the form of a packet, carefully labelled in the Earl's handwriting. The packet was found to contain the poet's "mull," or snuff-box, and a pedigree showing his connexion with the noble family of Home. The present Earl of Home has kindly permitted the publication of the pedigree in question. It traces the poet's descent on the mother's side to William Home of Bassenden, brother of that Sir James Home of Coldingknows whose great-grandson succeeded to the earldom of Home in 1635. Home of Bassenden's daughter Margaret, as appears from the pedigree, was married to "Mr. Trotter of Fogo, author of the song 'Polwarth on the Green'"; and their daughter Beatrix Trotter, having been married to the Rev. Robert Thomson, minister of Ednam, and later of Southdean, became the mother of James Thomson.

This pedigree, if accepted as correct, shows Thomson the poet's connexion with the illustrious house of the Homes to be of no distant degree. The Session Books of the parishes of Fogo and Westruther (for Bassenden), beginning no further back than 1660 and 1657 respectively, cast no light on the interesting subject; but the books of the Heraldry Office at Edinburgh give a correction (or at least a difference) and some additional details in connexion with William Home, the progenitor of the Homes of Bassenden. They inform us that soon after the Scottish Reformation, Andrew Currie, Vicar of Bassenden, conveyed to William Home, third son of "Sir James Home of Cowdenknows," "terras ecclesiasticas, mansionem, et glebam vicarie de Bassendene"—whereupon he obtained from James VI. a charter of the same on February 11th, 1573. The Heraldry Office further shows that Mr. Trotter of Wideopen had for wife a Margaret Home; and further, that Fogo belonged to the Homes up to the time when he came into possession of it. Possibly it became his by his marriage with Margaret Home, but whether she was a daughter of William Home of Bassenden the Office seems to have no record to show. The question, therefore, is—so far as the public records are concerned—Who was this Margaret Home, who was the grandmother of the poet?

It need hardly be pointed out that the establishment of Thomson's family connexion with the Homes would place in a new light the purpose of the young poet's flight to London, his interest with Lady Grizel Baillie and Lord Binning, and other somewhat obscure points, especially in the earlier part of his literary career.

It may be noted that Miss Bell's attribution of the fine old Scottish song 'Polwarth on the Green' to Mr. Trotter of Fogo is now generally discredited. There is no good reason to doubt that Allan Ramsay wrote it.

Literary Gossip.

A COMMITTEE of the Convocation of London University will be appointed immediately to consider the scheme of the Commission. It will appear from the complete report that provision is made for post-graduate teaching by the professors of the University—a point of cardinal importance considering the great advantages which London affords for advanced study.

Six of the Commissioners, we believe, dissented from the clause under which the University will be precluded from giving any endowment to King's College with its present constitution. The College will also be excluded from any subsidy for technical education from the London County Council, except for its evening classes, if the recommendations of Mr. Llewelyn Smith's report are adopted, on the ground that the associateship is reserved to matriculated students, who have to qualify in theology. It is understood that the Council of the College are about to issue a statement on the question.

MR. ANDREW LANG has written a ballad on one of the most picturesque incidents of Scottish history, the taking of the Bass by the imprisoned Cavaliers, their expulsion of the garrison, and evacuation with the honours of war, after holding the Rock against all comers for three years. The poem is entitled 'How they held the Bass for King James,' and will appear in Blackwood for March. Mr. P. A. Wright Henderson, who was Snell Exhibitioner in 1861, will contribute an article on 'Glasgow and Balliol,' in which he will give his reminiscences of Profs. Lushington, Ramsay, Buchanan, and Fleming of Glasgow; and of the men who governed Balliol thirty years ago—Scott, Jowett, Woolcombe, Palmer, Riddell, Wall, Henry Smith, W. L. Newman, and Green.

MR. E. DICEY has, we believe, gone to Bulgaria to write a book about that country.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON have in the press and will publish immediately a new work by Mr. Frankfort Moore, dealing with journalistic life. It will be entitled 'A Journalist's Note-Book,' and will contain some curious experiences and character sketches, as well as some hitherto unpublished anecdotes of Thackeray, Lord Tennyson, the late Emperor of Brazil, Henry Irving, Edwin Booth, Sir Charles Russell, and other distinguished persons.

A COPY of Dickens's works, the de luxe edition in thirty volumes, was sold under the hammer last week for 117. 10s. The auction value of these once coveted editions of books seems to be declining.

AT a sale at Messrs. Puttick & Simpson's the five volumes of the first edition of Mr. Ruskin's 'Modern Painters' fetched 87. 15s.; 'Miscellanea ad Usam Sarum' (Paris, 1515), 23s.; Savage Landor's 'Poems' (1795) and 'Simonidea' (1806), first editions, 16l. 7s. 6d.; a MS. collection of poems by Thomas, Lord Fairfax, about 1670, 5l. 5s.; Clarendon's 'Rebellion,' 4 vols., large paper, illustrated with 400 portraits, 21l.; Allot's 'England's Parnassus' (1600), 10l. 15s.; and a vellum Latin MS. Bible, written in a minute and clear hand (1400), 9l. 5s.

THE Gifford Lectures on Religion, delivered this session in the University of Edinburgh by Prof. Pfeiderer, of Berlin, are in the press, and will be published soon by Messrs. Blackwood & Sons. Prof. Pfeiderer has, by special arrangement, delivered both courses together.

DR. BRADSHAW, Inspector of Schools in Madras, has died in India. He had gained a reputation in this country within the last two or three years by his editions of Gray and Milton in the "Aldine Poets," and by his excellent edition of 'Chesterfield's Letters,' which we noticed last year. He had recently finished a concordance to Milton.

PROF. EDWARD ARBER, of Birmingham, will send out to the subscribers in the next few weeks the fifth or index volume of his privately printed 'Transcript of the Registers of the Company of Stationers of London, 1554-1640.' As all trace has been lost of some of the 230 sets which comprise the edition of this scarce work, their present owners are desired to communicate at once with Prof. Arber.

DR. SAMUEL DAVIDSON has seen through the press a new edition, thoroughly revised and enlarged, of his 'Introduction to the Study of the New Testament.' It will be published in two octavo volumes, as before, by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co.

AT Rochester a poll has been taken on the question of adopting the Free Libraries Act, when there was a considerable majority in favour of the adoption of the Act. A free library has just been opened at Harlesden. At Sheffield a resolution, which had been passed by the town councillors, ordering the blotting out of the betting news in papers supplied to the public reading-rooms, has been rescinded.

THE death is reported of Voislav Ilic, the "Servian Heine." He belonged to an old Servian poetic family, in which the gift has been handed down from father to son. His father was an esteemed poet, his brothers are poets, and his sons will probably be poets also. Voislav, however, had a distinct character of his own, which has made him the most popular of all the members of this family of poets. He fought as an officer in the Servian army, and after his retirement was provided with a small and ill-paid post in the civil service. He owes his epithet of "Heine" to the melancholy "Weltschmerz" tone which runs throughout his songs. He suffered, like Heine, from ceaseless illness, and had not reached his fortieth year at his death.

AN English version of the essay on 'Peace and War,' by M. Sève, which gained the prize offered by the Peace and Arbitration Association, has been published in advance of the original French text. The idea of the Association in offering the prize was distinctly educational, and they appeal to teachers to include this pamphlet in their reading or history lessons.

THE decease is announced of Dr. W. Alexander, a well-known journalist, at Aberdeen, and author of the popular 'Johnny Gibb of Gushetneuk.'

MR. PASSMORE EDWARDS will preside at the festival dinner of the News-vendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution, to be held at the Grand Hotel, Northumberland Avenue, on Tuesday, April 17th.

ABOUT 150*l.* has been collected for the proposed memorial to Prof. Minto, which is to take the form, according to the wish of Mrs. Minto, of a scholarship or prize in connexion with the English class at Aberdeen University.

THE Icelandic poet Helgi Hálfðánorson died at Reykjavik in the month of January, according to advices just received from Copenhagen. He was born on the 16th of August, 1826, of an Icelandic family which has for centuries been identified with ecclesiastical life. Since 1885 he had been principal of the Priests' Seminary in Reykjavik. He was an active writer, and has in various ways contributed to the modern literature of his country. But it is pre-eminently as a religious poet that Helgi Hálfðánorson will be remembered. The new Icelandic hymn-book, which owes its existence to him, contains more than two hundred of his own psalms and spiritual songs. He had been in priests' orders since 1855.

THE Worcestershire Historical Society is about to issue to members, as supplementary volumes during 1894 and 1895, an index to Nash's 'History of Worcestershire.' It will be prepared in two forms: one in folio, to range with Nash, and one in imperial octavo, to range with the ordinary publications of the Society. It will be supplied to members only, and all copies remaining after distribution will be destroyed. Applications for membership should be made to Mr. S. Southall, Guildhall, Worcester.

MR. THOMSON BOYD, of Edinburgh, died recently at the age of sixty-eight. He was one of the three brothers constituting the publishing firm of Oliver & Boyd, of whom the senior is Sir Thomas Boyd, who was formerly Lord Provost of Edinburgh. They succeeded to the business many years ago, on the death of their uncle Mr. George Boyd.

THE Critic of New York says:—

"The energetic efforts made by the friends of letters and learning, to have books printed in English put on the free list in the Wilson Bill, have failed. Representative Dr. William Everett of Massachusetts took charge of the cause in the House, but as he says in a letter to the President of Amherst College, 'I found very early that it was almost impossible for me to get in the amendment for free books in time—and so it ultimately proved.'"

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Goettingen for the purpose of erecting a Grabdenkmal on the Weender Friedhof to G. A. Bürger, the poet of 'Lenore,' on June 8th, being the centenary of the poet's death.

FROM Paris comes the news of the decease, at the age of sixty-three, of M. Alfred Dumeuil, the successor of Quinet in the Chair of Langues Méridionales at the Collège de France and the son-in-law of Michelet. He wrote on 'Bernard Palissy,' 'Jean Huss,' 'L'Art Italien,' &c. He has left behind him, it is said, an autobiography, giving an account of his relations with Lamartine, Michelet, Mickiewicz, and Quinet.

THE two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the "Pegnische Blumenorden" will be celebrated on October 18th at Nuremberg. The society was one of the Sprachgesellschaften founded in the seventeenth century for the purification of the German language. Later on it was transformed into a literary and social society, which still continues to this day. The name was derived from the river Pegnitz, which flows through the town, and from the fact that each member received a special name with the symbol of a flower. The last anniversary celebration took place in 1844.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week include the Fourth Report of the Vaccination Commission (6*v.* 7*d.*); the Annual Report of the Director of the National Gallery for 1893 (2*d.*); the Extradition Treaty between Great Britain and the Argentine Republic (1*d.*); Paper showing the Manner in which the Recommendations of the Royal Commission with respect to the Civil Service have been Dealt with (2*d.*); East India, Behar Cadastral Survey, Correspondence (1*s.* 5*d.*); and the Annual Report of the Poor Relief and Public Health Department, Scotland (1*s.* 9*d.*).

SCIENCE

THE LITERATURE OF MINING.

Machinery for Metalliferous Mines: a Practical Treatise for Mining Engineers, Metallurgists, and Managers of Mines. By E. Henry Davies, F.G.S. (Crosby Lockwood & Son.)—The number of works on mining that have been published lately is quite abnormal, and should the rate of increase continue, there must inevitably soon be a glut of this class of literature. Of introductory manuals to the whole subject there are already enough and to spare, and it seems evident that it is only by specializing that authors can now hope to meet a legitimate demand. Mr. E. H. Davies appears to have understood this, and in expanding into the handsome and well-illustrated volume before us the few chapters of his late father's 'Treatise on Metalliferous Minerals and Mining' which dealt with mechanical appliances, he has done the advanced student and the manager of mines good service. Almost every kind of machinery in actual use in the working of lodes in Britain is carefully described, and the woodcuts and plates accompanying the descriptions are exceptionally clear and to the point. The author professes only to give an account of successfully applied devices, but we think that some forms of apparatus which have done good work in their time, though unfashionable for the nonce, or even altogether obsolete, might have been included with advantage. In no branch of engineering is evolution more easily traceable than in the growth of mining machinery, and the steps by which present methods have been arrived at are highly instructive. We miss, for instance, any details respecting the old, and not yet extinct, man engine; and several valuable hints might, we think, have been gathered from many ingenious expedients found useful under special conditions abroad, but omitted here. Still, within the limits which he has marked out for himself, Mr. Davies has produced a book which, we have no doubt, will be as successful as the others on cognate subjects which he has helped to compile. Where so many types of machinery are explained it is difficult to select any particular section for special praise, but we are much struck with the excellence of the chapter on pumps and pumping, and with the many novelties introduced in that on electricity as a motive power. Aerial ropeways are also treated of in an interesting and practical manner. One word of commendation is due to the author for the impartiality which characterizes his pages. This is a feature not rarely absent from works on mechanical contrivances. Nothing here bears the slightest resemblance to a commercial puff.

Mining: an Elementary Treatise on the Getting of Minerals. By Arnold Lupton, M.I.C.E. (Longmans & Co.)—In many respects this is so laborious and painstaking a treatise that one cannot but regret that its preface and its first chapter (on geology) should be so written as to strongly prejudice the reader against it. As of malice prepense, the author has contrived, by the self-laudatory tone of the one, and by the inadequacy and inaccuracy of the other, to give a most unfavourable—and as it turns out, very unfair—impression of himself and his work. The student must not be repelled by this unfortunate beginning. After the twenty-eighth page all goes well, and in the five hundred pages or so that follow will be found one of the most condensed and closely packed accounts of mining operations and appliances in the language. No trouble has evidently been spared to render the compilation as complete as possible, and its value is enhanced by the fact that Prof. Lupton has drawn much of his illustrative matter from his own long experience as a mining engineer in the great Yorkshire and Midland coalfields. It is essentially as one familiar with collieries that Prof. Lupton can speak with authority, and although, as he informs us, he no doubt has some personal knowledge of other branches of the subject, it would, perhaps, have been better not to burden his book with details connected with metal-mining only. More space would have been available for the useful expansion of highly compressed passages, and, considering how distinct the working of ore-deposits is, in many ways, from the working of coal-seams, greater unity of purpose would have been attained. As it is, the great bulk of the work relates to the winning and getting of coal, and vein-mining is far less fully and less satisfactorily dealt with. From an engineer who is also a teacher one has a right to expect a greater amount of strictness in the use of words than is to be found in ordinary technological manuals. The author is disappointing in this particular. He frequently uses provincial terms without explanation, forgetting that every one is not "Yorkshire"; and he not seldom misuses well-known words. Thus he describes a plane as being "vertical" to another—the converse of the common mistake of using "perpendicular" for "vertical." The term "cleavage" also, and several others, he uses very loosely. But nowhere is this looseness so conspicuous as in the introductory pages on geology to which we have already alluded. Here carelessness and absolute blundering go hand-in-hand. Iron (not iron ore) is, we are told, "most commonly found as a stone impregnated with iron, and as such is itself a stratified rock." Potassium, we are also informed, is a mineral "mined in veins" at the present time, both at home and abroad. On the other hand, in a very strange table given at p. 19, "gas" is given as a mineral apparently not found in Great Britain, and "potassium ore" is likewise excluded from those islands. What these statements mean we cannot even guess. The remarks on fossils, brief as they are, are scarcely happier. After the encouraging assurance that "the student soon learns the distinctive appearance of some of the strata of each formation," the writer adds that "with regard to the characteristic fossils of each system, the student may easily learn to recognize the lina by the ammonites (see fig. 13) and belemnites which abound." Turning to fig. 13, we find it labelled "Ammonite (Humphriesianus)" [sic], and Ammonites humphriesianus does not happen to be a liassic form. Another illustration in this unfortunate chapter, fig. 10, would alone justify our strictures. This is an ideal section from W. to E. across England, with granite at one end at the base of all things, and a thick miocene division between the eocene and pliocene at the other. After things like these it is somewhat surprising and decidedly refreshing to find in the very next chapter—on exploration—some new and excellent examples of geological-map reading. Before closing this notice it must be repeated that Prof. Lupton must not be judged from his geology. In mining he is at home, and writes with corresponding advantage to his readers. He and his publishers must be thanked for the very numerous and, in many cases, original woodcuts, which, though often rather too small, afford invaluable aid in elucidating the text. We should have been glad to see many more references to other authors than are to be found in this treatise.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

The small partial eclipse of the moon on the 21st prox. will not be visible in any part of Europe, and will be best seen in Australasia.

It will be remembered that after the star Nova Aurigæ had decreased in brightness so as to become almost invisible with the most powerful telescopes in April, 1892 (about three months after its discovery by Dr. Anderson), it became considerably brighter again in the following August, and was then noticed at the Lick Observatory to be nebulous in appearance, the nebula surrounding a stellar nucleus of about the tenth magnitude. Dr. Roberts, however, obtained two excellent photographs of it at Crowborough in October and December, and concluded that there was then "no indication of nebulosity round the Nova or in its vicinity." Dr. and Mrs. Huggins made a careful scrutiny of its image in a reflecting telescope of 18 inches aperture and very fine definition on the night (very favourable for the purpose) of January 12th last (Ast. Nach. No. 3211), when the Nova came up to focus absolutely with a small star, only a little less bright, in its immediate neighbourhood; they remarked particularly that with the highest power the image was as small and as sharply defined as that of the small star, there being no indication of nebulosity.

The planet Mercury will be in inferior conjunction with the sun on the morning of the 14th prox., and will not be visible to the naked eye during any part of the month. Venus is a morning star in the constellation Aquarius (passing 3° due south of β Aquarii on the 25th prox.), and will attain her greatest brilliancy on the 23rd. Mars will move during March from Sagittarius into Capricornus; he does not rise until nearly 4 o'clock in the morning, and in consequence of his great southern declination never attains any considerable elevation in the heavens. Jupiter continues to be visible in the west in the early part of the night, a few degrees to the south of the Pleiades; by the end of next month he will set about 10 o'clock in the evening. Saturn is still in the eastern part of the constellation Virgo, rising about 9 o'clock in the evening; he will be near the moon on the 22nd prox., the conjunction taking place after daylight on the following morning.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Feb. 15.—Sir J. Evans, Treas. and V.P. in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Chemical Analysis of the Meteoric Stone found at Makarua, near Invercargill, New Zealand, in the Year 1886,' by Mr. L. Fletcher; 'On the Photographic Arc Spectrum of Iron Meteorites,' by Prof. Lockyer; 'On certain Ternary Alloys: Part VIII. Alloys containing Aluminium, Cadmium, and Tin; Aluminium, Antimony, and Lead; or Aluminium, Antimony, and Bismuth,' by Dr. A. Wright; and 'On the Straining of the Earth, resulting from Secular Cooling,' by Mr. C. Davison.

GEOLOGICAL.—Feb. 16.—Anniversary Meeting.—Mr. W. H. Hudleston, President, in the chair.—The medals and funds were awarded as we mentioned in our number for January 13th.—The following is a list of the officers and Council for the ensuing year: President, Dr. H. Woodward; Vice-Presidents, Prof. A. H. Green, Dr. G. J. Hinde, Prof. J. W. Judd, and Mr. R. Lydekker; Secretaries, Mr. J. E. Marr and Mr. J. J. H. Teall; Foreign Secretary, Mr. J. W. Hulke; Treasurer, Prof. T. Wiltshire; Council, Mr. H. Baerman, Prof. W. T. Blanford, Sir J. Evans, Prof. A. H. Green, Dr. J. W. Gregory, Mr. A. Harker, Dr. G. J. Hinde, Mr. T. V. Holmes, Mr. W. H. Hudleston, Mr. J. W. Hulke, Prof. J. W. Judd, Prof. C. Lapworth, Mr. R. Lydekker, Lieut.-General C. A. McMahon, Mr. J. E. Marr, Mr. H. W. Monckton, Mr. C. Reid, Mr. F. Rutley, Mr. J. J. H. Teall, Prof. T. Wiltshire, Rev. H. H. Winwood, Dr. H. Woodward, and Mr. H. B. Woodward.

NUMISMATIC.—Feb. 15.—Sir J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Prof. J. H. Middleton exhibited a contemporary forgery in silver (once gilt) of a noble of Edward III., found at Cheltenham.—Mr. W. C. Boyd exhibited an ancient forgery of a Roman denarius of Antoninus Pius, reverse Minerva, and blundered inscription.—Mr. L. A. Lawrence exhibited a forgery of a half-crown of Charles I., struck on a plated "flan"; also Oxford and Aberystwyth threepences of the same reign.—Mr. Durlacher exhibited a silver porter's badge, bearing the name of "John Moseley, Fellowship Porter, Aug. 7th, 1777," and the arms of the City of London.—Mr. H. Montagu read a paper 'On the Coinage of Edward V.,' in which he discussed very fully the origin of the mint-marks, the rose and sun dimidiated, and the bear's head, which were used by that king and by his uncle Richard III. The former was a contraction of two separate mint-marks, the rose and the sun, of his father Edward IV.; but the bear's head was the badge of Richard III., which had previously been borne by his father Richard, Duke of York. The writer attributed to Edward V. all the coins bearing the name of Edward in conjunction with either or both of these mint-marks. Hawkins in 1841 was of opinion that there were no extant coins of Edward V., but in the recent editions of his work this view has been abandoned by the editor, Mr. Kenyon. To his description of ten coins of Edward V. Mr. Montagu added that of an angel in his own collection, which, though bearing the name of Edward on the obverse, has on the reverse an α in place of an ϵ at the side of the mast of the ship. Mr. Montagu believed this coin to have been struck from an altered die of Edward V., and to have been issued immediately after the accession of Richard III.

LINNEAN.—Feb. 15.—Prof. Stewart, President, in the chair.—Mr. L. Greening was elected, and Mr. A. Smith was admitted a Fellow.—Mr. W. B. Hemaley exhibited some germinating seeds of Lemna and some flowering plants of Lemna gibba, upon which, in his absence, some remarks were made by Mr. C. H. Wright. From the observations made, it was inferred that although Lemna minor and L. gibba are usually regarded as distinct, they are respectively the male and female plant of one species.—On behalf of the Director of the Royal Gardens, Kew, Mr. C. H. Wright exhibited and made some remarks upon a collection of native plants from the neighbourhood of Cape Town, which had been presented to the Herbarium by Miss Yorke, and which was remarkable for the skilful way in which the natural colours of the flowers had been preserved.—On behalf of the Rev. J. G. Tuck, of Tostock Rectory, Bury St. Edmunds, there was exhibited a hybrid between the common house sparrow and the tree sparrow (Passer montanus), which had been taken near Bury on January 13th last. Only one instance of a similar wild hybrid was known to have been previously captured, although two or three instances were on record of the two species interbreeding in aviaries.—Mr. J. C. Willis gave an abstract of a paper 'On the Natural History of the Flower' (Part II.), in which he dealt with the mode of fertilization in Bradiola izioides, S. Watson, Stanhopea tigrina, Bateman, Pimelia decussata, R. Br., var. diomefolia, Cotyledon umbilicus, L., Hydrolea spinosa, L., and Ziziphora capitata, and made some remarks on cleistogamy in Salvia verbenacea, L.—A discussion followed, in which Dr. D. H. Scott, Prof. R. Green, and Mr. A. B. Rendle took part.—The Secretary read a paper by Miss D. F. Perts 'On Hygroscopic Movements connected with Seed-dispersal,' in which the author partially reviewed the literature of the subject, and detailed the method of observation adopted by previous workers and by herself.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Feb. 20.—Mr. A. Giles, President, in the chair.—A paper was read 'On Forging by Hydraulic Pressure,' by Mr. R. H. Tweddell.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Feb. 15.—Hon. G. N. Curzon, M.P., in the chair.—A paper on 'Experiences at the Court of Afghanistan' was read before the Indian Section by Mr. J. A. Gray, late Surgeon to His Highness Abdul Rahman Khan, Ameer of Afghanistan.

Feb. 19.—The first lecture of a course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Decorative Treatment of Traditional Foliage' was delivered by Mr. Hugh Stannus.

Feb. 20.—Sir A. Rollet in the chair.—A paper 'On the Arts and Industries of Belgium and the Antwerp Exhibition, 1894,' was read before a meeting of the Foreign and Colonial Section by M. R. Sève.

Feb. 21.—Sir R. Webster in the chair.—A paper 'On Electric Signalling without Wires' was read by Mr. W. H. Preece, Engineer in Chief to the General Post Office.—A discussion followed.

HISTORICAL.—Feb. 15.—Annual Meeting.—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read the Report of the Council on the literary work and financial position of the Society at the close of the past session.—Lord Rosebery, Prof. Max Müller, and Prof. Peiham were elected Vice-Presidents, and Prof. Maitland, Mr. Hubert Hall, Prof. Tout, Mr. C. W. C. Oman, and Mr. I. S. Leadam were elected Members of the Council.—Sir J. H. Ramsay was elected a Fellow.—The President delivered his annual address, choosing as his subject the importance of a study of the works of Tacitus for the purpose of estimating the continuity of historical phenomena, this being a pendant to the presidential address of 1893 on the lessons to be derived from the historical writings of Thucydides. In the course of his address the President referred to numerous passages in Tacitus which appeared applicable to the events and statesmanship of our own day. The remarkable sagacity of Tacitus and his inimitable sententiousness have also been responsible for some expressions that may be ranked as proverbs. After an eloquent review of the Roman historian's ideal of a great orator, Sir M. E. Grant Duff concluded by expressing his conviction that a careful study of this author would undoubtedly repay the modern statesman and historian.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Feb. 5.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. W. H. Fairbrother 'On Green and his Critics.' The "critics" dealt with were Prof. Seth in 'Hegelianism and Personality,' and Mr. Balfour's essays in Mind. The thorough self-consistency of Green's philosophical system as a whole was due to the fact that his ethical and political doctrines were the direct logical outcome of his metaphysical teaching. This teaching was in no way borrowed from Kant or Hegel, but the result of an analysis into the facts of consciousness. Still less could Green be charged with pantheism, whether metaphysical or theological, or with the potitio principii of a "ready-made ontology." The "criticism" fell to the ground as both false and irrelevant. It was untrue in its statement of what Green actually taught, and consisted for the most part of what was practically a restatement in slightly different language of and exhaustive study in silver-point of voluminous drapery arranged with sculptural severity and breadth upon the knees of a seated figure. It is on pink paper, and evidently by the same hand as that which drew on blue paper a curiously similar study of the same subject which, ascribed erroneously to Leonardo, is one of the chief ornaments of the Salle des Boites at the Louvre. Near this instance are three more drapery studies by Di Credi, which illustrate his indomitable care and skill as a draughtsman.

To the old collection of the Museum belong several neighbouring specimens; and near them is the fine head, from the Malcolm Collection, of a war-worn soldier in a fantastic helmet, which has been repeatedly reproduced. This is by Da Vinci. The beautiful, large head of a young male saint, with "I.O." outside the nimbus, seems portrait-like, and, being a masterpiece of pure drawing, deserves the name of a great draughtsman. Close to it hangs the famous design in pen and ink of a chalice with the sacred wafer above it, formerly attributed to Mantegna, and now to a Venetian, who had not escaped the influence of Dürer's florid Gothic phase. As we recorded at the time, the Museum bought it not long ago. By Gentile Bellini, and among the fruits of his adventurous journey into Turkey in 1479, are two capital drawings with a pen, which have been engraved, representing severally a Turkish soldier and a Turkish woman, both seated on the ground. The former is not, of course, the great Sultan Mahomet II. himself, as used to be supposed. A 'Study for the Portrait of a Man,' at once quaint, severe, and laborious, is, rightly, we think, attributed to Antonello. It belonged to Mr. Malcolm. Ercole Roberti's fine and passionate, but much damaged 'Pieta' compels us to recognize as his the still finer little predella picture with the Virgin dressed in black (formerly awarded to Mantegna), which is one of the ornaments of the Roscoe Collection at Liverpool. To this succeed several studies of value for enabling tyros to discriminate Perugino, Pinturicchio, and others, their contemporaries. Signorelli's fine group of kneeling figures for an 'Adoration of the Shepherds' is replete with his vigour and large sense of style. It has been squandered for engraving.

A fine group of studies of female heads and figures—all from the same model, a very sweet and pretty damsel—have been evidently arranged to mark the difference between Timoteo della Viti and Raphael. The shades of divergence, although sometimes almost imperceptible, nevertheless do not fail to indicate that of four heads which are in one case, the last of them, a half-length figure of a smiling maiden, is by Raphael himself and of his early Florentine period, while the first of the four is by Timoteo, and is rather jejune, stiff, and, though more laboured, less researchful and far less tender and animated than the fourth, which, like the third of the group, indicates a freer hand, a joyous mood, and a more sympathetic touch. Further on is a charming Madonna's head, doubtless from the above-named maiden, evidently by Raphael, and of c. 1504, as it is officially dated. This beautiful example was Mr. Malcolm's. The second stage of Raphael's career is illustrated in several succeeding cases, one of which contains a most instructive example of the ancient practice of fraudulently copying drawings. In the upper row of the case the visitor will find a (Malcolm) drawing in ink with a pen, bearing the square-framed mark of Sir Joshua Reynolds, of some standing naked male figures, parts of a well-known composition in the Vatican, and much more energetic, spontaneous, and skilful than the (B.M.) version now hanging below it, which long passed for, and has been engraved as, an original. This comparison will lead most of us to say that the adjoining drawing of 'A Man seated straddling on a Cloud' is manifestly a copy of a Raphael, but by a hand much less skilful than that of the forger of the Vatican group. Its disproportions, the imperfect comprehension of anatomy, and other crudities are only too plain. It bears the small Italian "F" of Richardson the younger. Still more plainly by a copyist is the 'Hercules and Nessus,' long ascribed to Raphael, which has always seemed to us a Bandinelli, or possibly by a later man. Some capital sketches of designs by Fra Bartolommeo, illustrating his taste and power of composing figures in a monumental manner, are worth looking at. The next group are by Michael Angelo, or attributed to him. In some of them no artist will believe. A lovely group of flying figures, rightly named 'Thetis with the Arms of Achilles,' is a gem of Primaticcio's art.

Correggio's, Campagnolo's, G. Bassano's, Paolo Veronese's, Guercino's, Albano's, Dolci's, Clouet's, Dumoustiers, Claude, Poussins, Watteaus (including exquisite girls' heads from the Malcolm Collection), Durers (or attributed to him), Holbeins, Elzheimers, Rubenses, Van Dycks, Rembrandts (a superb series), Lievenses, Jan de Brys (among which the brilliant half-lengths of two sisters, from the Malcolm and Museum collections, join each other again after centuries of separation), Terburgs, Mierises, and Van Ostades, to say nothing of a host of later specimens, are to be found in this wonderful exhibition of designs and studies.

A NEWLY DISCOVERED PORTRAIT OF THOMAS GRAY, THE POET.

A GENUINE and hitherto unrecorded portrait of the poet Thomas Gray has recently been discovered at 50, Albemarle Street, where, indeed, a pictorial record of the bard had never been suspected to lurk. In clearing out a seldom used room on an upper floor a well-painted portrait came to light. It attracted Mr. Murray's attention, and awakened his curiosity.

When the picture was shown to me, I at once recognized it as a portrait of Thomas Gray, the poet, of a novel type, differing both in style and turn of the head from all other portraits known of him. Among the portraits of Gray, which, after all, are not numerous, this is the only one with the eyes fixed on the spectator. All the others are looking away. Besides this, only three portraits in oils are known to exist.

Gray seems actually to have given sittings on two occasions only, and those quite early in life. He sat at the age of fifteen to Richardson in 1731, and at the age of thirty-one to Eocardt in 1747. The third oil painting, a posthumous one, in Pembroke College, will hereafter be noticed. With the exception of these two early portraits and the Albemarle Street picture, all known portraits of Gray are in absolute profile, sometimes turned to the right and sometimes to the left. They all represent him at the same period of life, with variations as to the cut of the coat and manner of dressing the hair.

These profiles were based on a silhouette, then known as a "black shade," taken after he was forty, by Mr. Mapletoft, formerly a Fellow of Pembroke College. Gray, in a letter to the Rev. James Browne, dated October 23rd, 1768, mentions an etching of himself done by Mason. Horace Walpole had in his collection at Strawberry Hill a profile which he describes in the catalogue as "Mr. Thomas Gray; etched from his shade by Mr. W. Mason." Two genuine silhouettes, or profile shades, of Gray still remain at Pembroke College, and I have seen them there. They originally belonged to Dr. Turner.

It was a happy instinct of Mr. Mason's to make use of the silhouette for producing a more complete portrait. He took the external outline, and completed the portrait by drawing within the contour the eyes, mouth, nostril, cravat, coat collar, and rolls of curls on his wig, as he was accustomed to see them. One of Mason's drawings of Gray in indian ink, in the library at Nuneham Harcourt, is excellent. It is preserved in a large scrap-book and not frequently seen. When Gray's works were to be published after his death, Mason, with the assistance of Benjamin Wilson, an experienced portrait painter, and, like Mason, a native of Yorkshire, prepared a careful drawing in profile of the poet.

Wilson, born in 1721 at Leeds, besides being an artist, was a philosopher and electrician; he was F.R.S. His portraits were distinguished by a breadth and solidity of shadow, and his etchings were numerous and diversified. He wrote on scientific subjects.

Mason, a poet, the son of a clergyman at Hull, in addition to literature, studied music and painting. He became Precentor and Canon Residentiary of York. He published a work on church music in 1795, and composed anthems. When young he translated Du Fresnoy's Latin poem on painting. In 1783 it was published in quarto with annotations by Sir Joshua Reynolds. Besides innumerable sketches of Gray in profile, Mason painted Whitehead the poet and an altarpiece of "the good Samaritan" for the church at Nuneham. He composed music for the responses to the Commandments, which was set on the organ-bell in the same church, for he was on intimate terms with the Harcourt family. Lord Nuneham, in a letter to his father Earl Harcourt, dated October 25th, 1776, described a visit which he had paid to Mason at Aston Hall, where he found the entire household, under the Canon's influence, devoted to the practice and study of art. "Aston," Lord Nuneham says, "was the very temple of genius and good taste. We had delightful music, and the servants as well as their master are artists. His young footman has produced some excellent etchings and copies in oil." Walpole writes to Mason in July, 1773, criticizing a portrait of Gray done by Mason's boy Charles in the following terms: "The eye is too open," "In general there is more vivacity than was in his countenance; and yet I think it will be difficult to produce a more faithful likeness."

Gray himself was devoted to music and studied it assiduously. He delighted in the new Italian school, and sang well. He had lessons on the harpsichord from Scarlatti. This strongly pronounced taste of Gray may have influenced Walpole in selecting the figure and costume of Liberti by Van Dyck for Gray's portrait by Eocardt. Liberti was the celebrated organist of Antwerp Cathedral.

The profile turned to the left, and placed as a frontispiece to the first edition of Gray's works, encircled by a wreath of laurel, and a small lyre introduced below, is perhaps the best known of all the portraits of Thomas Gray. The profile is singularly birdlike. Basire made a most delicate drawing of this entire arrangement before commencing his engraving. The latter was afterwards worked upon by other hands and spoilt, but the drawing has fortunately escaped injury, and is now preserved in excellent condition in the National Portrait Gallery. That this profile was directly derived from the "black shade" now at Pembroke Lodge, Cambridge, is clearly shown by the introduction of a long rope-like queue to his wig, extending down the line of his back. At one place it is detached from the coat and the light seen through. The Basire drawing is the work of a very superior artist. The foldings of the coat are rendered with great intelligence, especially those down the side of the body, next his arm. The coat is thrown more open, showing the waistcoat, with three buttons prominent on the other side. In the drawing the button-holes are faintly marked; but in the engraving they are showily edged with lace. The flexible nature of the coat collar is lost sight of in the engraving, and the plain white cravat is lost in unmeaning shadow. On the engraving, under the stems of the branches forming the wreath, is inscribed in small clear letters, "W. Mason & B. Wilson, vivi memores delineaverunt," and in a distinct place, "Engraved by James Basire."

It would appear that Wilson painted the oil portrait now in the Combination Room at Pembroke College from these same materials. I am not aware of any record of the date when this portrait was received into the College, but the period would range from 1775 to 1788, when Wilson died in Bloomsbury. Here again we recognize the long rope-like queue, derived from the "black shade" belonging to Mr. Turner at Pembroke Lodge. The figure, life size, painted in oil, is seen to the waist, turned in profile to the left. He wears a yellow-brown coat (the folds of which are artistically treated, as seen in Basire's original drawing), a plain white cravat and no shirt collar, and a light flaxen wig, with rolls of curls over the ear. Behind the head is a dark mass of brown colour, which might either be a rock or the trunk of a tree. To the left of this in an open landscape is a church with a spire, which rises above the distant hills. The complexion is fair, with pink cheeks, and the face close shaven. The general tone of the picture is heavy, but the shadows are well massed, and the light cleverly concentrated on the forehead and cheeks. This picture, omitting the church and landscape, was engraved by R. Pollard.

From this painting an exact copy was taken by Benjamin Vander Gucht for Lord Harcourt at Nuneham Courtenay. It still adorns the library there. Benjamin Vander Gucht, grandson of a distinguished engraver, was greatly employed in large houses. He painted original portraits, made copies, restored pictures, and was besides a dealer. He cleaned and repaired Lord Burlington's pictures at Chiswick, and made many copies of original portraits for Nuneham and Althorp. He was accidentally drowned in crossing the Thames at night.

The Albemarle Street picture presents the same materials and artistic treatment as the profile painting at Pembroke College, but the figure is turned round to the spectator, showing more of the face, and the side of his very aquiline nose is in shadow. Although this feature in Gray is so very decided in form, it does not dominate the rest of the face as we see in busts of the Roman emperors or modern individuals like Chatham and Wellington. Here the rope-like queue has been exchanged for a small tie. The tall rock or trunk of a tree remains the same; but the landscape to the left is altered. The church has a square tower, but no spire. In front of the grove is a group of leafless trees; and beyond the church, against the horizon, is a building on a lofty eminence, from behind which the rays of morning light seem to issue. The general impression is as if the poet represented in the profile version of Wilson and Mason in the Combination Room had suddenly turned round to look at you. The chief distinction in this Albemarle Street picture is that the eyes look piercingly at the spectator.

In all other portraits, even those by Richardson and Eccardt, the eyes are turned away. This is the more remarkable as we are told that Gray had a singularly piercing look when addressing any one. Mr. Norton Nichols, when introduced to Mr. Gray at Cambridge, being then a lad of eighteen or nineteen years, was much impressed by this peculiarity, and described it afterwards to Mr. Matthias as realizing the Italian expression "folgerante sguardo."

Any one who had seen the oil painting of Gray in the Combination Room at Pembroke College would at once recognize this as the work of the same artist. Such a picture, one might imagine, would immediately have been engraved.

Very recently, however, I met with a small engraving, an oval about two inches high, which was evidently done from the Albemarle Street picture, and seems to have been intended to decorate the title-page of a small-sized edition of Gray's poems. It is in the Print Room of the British Museum. The portrait is engraved in stipple by Chapman. The painter's name is also given: "Wilson pinxit." Below the engraving, on the same copper, as a half-title, is inscribed the following: "Printed and sold by G. Nicholson, Poughnill near Ludlow, sold also in London by H. D. Symonds, Paternoster Row, Chapman & Co., Aldgate, Lackington, Allen & Co., Finsbury Square, and all other booksellers." No date is traceable. I have sought in vain for any record of such an edition of "Gray's poems, with the author's Life." The plate has the appearance of being a proof, and may possibly never have reached publication.

Although small and without a date, the existence of this plate is of particular importance. It shows that the portrait was recognized as genuine and intended for a choice edition of his works. The name of Wilson also confirms the opinion that the portrait was the work of the same hand as painted the oil profile in the Combination Room of Gray's own college.

On one occasion only, in the year 1778, do we find the names of Gray and Mason associated with John Murray, who was at that time resident in Fleet Street. We learn from Dr. Smiles's "Account of the Origin and Progress of the House of John Murray" that, after the death of Gray in 1771, Mason, as his literary executor, prosecuted Murray in the Court of Chancery for printing and publishing some fifty lines of Gray's poetry without first obtaining the requisite permission. The publisher lost his cause, but a letter of remonstrance, couched in dignified terms, which he addressed in a pamphlet to Mason, fully vindicated the course he had pursued, and received the approbation of Dr. Johnson and the candid critics of his day. This incident and Mr. Murray's admiration for the poetry of Gray, as evinced in his reproduction of the fifty lines, do not suffice to account for the appearance of the portrait in Albemarle Street. There is, however, so much independence about this portrait, so much more of Wilson than of Mason, that we are inclined to inquire whether any personal friendship existed between Wilson the painter and Murray the publisher—whether, indeed, this picture might have come direct to Mr. Murray from the artist. Benjamin Wilson was, as we have seen, a man of science and wrote on various subjects. He succeeded Hogarth as serjeant-painter, and both aristocratic and scientific celebrities sat to him.

All sculptured portraits of Gray are posthumous. In 1778 Mason commissioned John Bacon, the sculptor, who was then executing various works in Westminster Abbey, to carve the monument which still exists in Poets' Corner, adjacent to Milton. A female figure of Eloquence supports a medallion with a head of Gray in profile, turned to the left, on it. This is simply a reproduction of Mason's own drawing. Here the hair is gracefully flowing and naturally dressed.

Another portrait of Thomas Gray, a life-sized bust probably the work of Bacon, also deserves record. It was sold in a collection of MSS. and relics of Thomas Gray at Messrs. Sotheby's in August, 1851. The bust was intended to be placed in the flower garden at Stoke Park. It is now treasured in the National Portrait Gallery, to which it was presented by Joshua W. Butterworth, Esq., F.S.A. Here the face is close shaven, the hair close cut and in its natural growth, and the neck bare. It accords strikingly with the Albemarle Street painting, but the eyeballs are not indicated. The "folgerante sguardo" is wanting.

GEORGE SCHWAB.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.
(Sixth Notice.—Rubens and Van Dyck.)

RUBENS and Van Dyck changed the art of the Low Countries, and substituted for a sincere and natural school a style that, however splendid, was florid and artificial. De Hooghe, Steen, Teniers, and others, it is true, continued to work on the national lines, but none of their successors who made any mark escaped the influence of Rubens, so that art in the Low Countries entered upon a new phase, and, in the end, the introduction of Italian motives and foreign taste proved fatal, and for a generation, at least, nothing like national art existed in Flanders or Holland. It nowadays seems scarcely credible that Mignon, Netscher, Van der Werff, Van der Meulen, Gerard de Lairesse, and Francisque—to say nothing of obacurer men—succeeded the giants of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and that Halses were sold for florins and Rembrandts became cheap. Such, however, was the case. While we are speaking of Rubens and Van Dyck, it is to be regretted that, painters of true genius as they were, their works are not more numerous this year at Burlington House, where Van Dyck, at least, has been so often and so gloriously represented.

Of Rubens himself there is at present small occasion to speak, although his influence on Van Dyck is manifest in two of that painter's three large canvases, while, oddly enough, it distinctly underlies the, for a time, overpowering influence of Paolo Veronese in the magnificent portrait of the Genoese Doge Spinola (No. 125), which Mr. Heywood-Lonsdale has generously lent to fill the place of honour in Gallery III. Mr. C. Butler's Portrait of a Lady (No. 67), which is inscribed "Virgo Brabantina," we have more than once seen before, and, so far as the face is concerned, with ever-increasing doubts as to the extent of the damage which may have been done to it by injudicious restorations—doubts which are accompanied by suspicions as to whether or not Rubens's hand was ever employed to finish and correct the errors of drawing (see the eyes and nose), which must needs be ascribed to one of those assistants whose handiwork is only too distinctly seen in the master's official pictures. We cannot believe that, especially at a time to which such a portrait as this must be allotted, Rubens drew or even painted a face so inferior, to which the Academicians have awarded a conspicuous place on the line, and in the best light, in Gallery II. The artistic qualities of the dress may have secured this honourable place for an unsatisfactory picture. They indicate the middle period of Rubens's practice, are of high merit in their way, and prove the skill of the master's assistants, one of whom, we think, painted the face. Lord Amherst has lent his capital large group of Dead Game (57), by Rubens and Snyders, which, even more than most works of the class to which it belongs, illustrates the extraordinary brush power, splendid handling, and forthright draughtsmanship of the master and his most robust pupil. Rubens, and of course, in following him, Snyders, failed to profit as much as they might have done by those Italian influences which had so great an effect upon the Dutch School. Had it been otherwise, besides that largeness of treatment which imparts artistic interest to the dead animals, the fruit, and the dogs, we should have found grouped colours, tones, and masses of homogeneous textures, which are conspicuously absent in this strong and nervous piece of art. As it is, the chiaroscuro and grand simplicity of Italy are wanting to make this otherwise fine piece a specimen of consummate art. Still, we trace in "Dead Game" an unusually large proportion of the master's painting, while Snyders's share is, even for him, more than ordinarily masculine. The Fig (83), of the same artists, which Lord Windsor has lent, comprises—besides dead game, as in No. 57—a man with a falcon, a woman, and three dogs, all painted with astonishing skill and freedom, but even less effectively arranged in masses. Yet, like No. 57, it proves the amazing wealth of the artists' technical resources.

It was at Genoa that Van Dyck first took his proper place among the great artists of the world, when it became, so to say, a distinction to sit to him. Among those who sat to him was the Doge Andrea Spinola, to whose magnificent life-size, whole-length portrait, No. 125, we have already alluded as one of the greatest pictures in the exhibition. It embodies in the completest manner the highest qualities of Van Dyck's art during his Genoese period, and enables us to distinguish the paintings belonging to it from those which are due to the sojourn of the master in other cities. At this epoch he was affected by the artistic influences amid which he lived and worked—so much so that it is not difficult to discriminate the portraits he painted at Venice and Rome from those he painted at Genoa, in all of which masses of gorgeous crimson and intense black form leading elements of the chromatic scheme. It is not a paradox to say that here, as in all such cases, Van Dyck contrived to make even the diverse whites of his sitters' ruffs and cuffs subserve the truly black portions of the picture, and effectually bear their parts in the coloration of the whole. Paolo Veronese delighted in this expedient, and that Van Dyck was greatly taken with it they may be sure who look at 'Andrea Spinola,' as well as at other Genoese Van Dycks, e.g., the delightful portraits of 'A Man and Child' (1873) and 'A Lady and her Daughter' (1874) in the Grand Gallery of the Louvre. In the latter two, which were probably not painted in Italy, Genoese influences survived the artist's return to the Low Countries. In pictures like that before us Van Dyck matched himself with such magnificent masters as Paolo, and did not suffer in the contest, and he never painted better. Apart from this he was to be envied the opportunity of delineating this stately and astute-looking Italian gentleman, at once vigorous and aristocratic, from whose features and character every vulgar element had, as his presence seems to indicate, been eliminated by the highest breeding. The splendid crimson robe of the Genoese Doge was, as comparisons of pictures suggest, somewhat darker in tone than the not less sumptuous mantle of the Venetian Doge. This noble picture is in perfect preservation, and as brilliant as if it had not long left the easel of some modern painter, say that of M. Jacquet, whose life-size, whole-length figure of a lady clad, like Spinola, from head to foot in crimson, and known as 'Rêverie,' was the delight of visitors to the Salon about fifteen years ago. The 'Cardinal Bentivoglio' of Van Dyck, now in the Pitti, is an exact analogue of 'Andrea Spinola,' and, like it, must have been painted when the artist was about twenty-four years of age. No. 125 was not mentioned by Smith nor M. Guiffrey in their catalogues of Van Dycks; it probably came from the Palazzo Spinola, and was unknown in this country until Sir Henry Hawley, of Leybourne Grange, lent it as No. 168 in the Academy of 1879, when it hung near its present place.

Lord Leicester's Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick (124), is a whole-length, life-size portrait, standing, and, except the head, clad in armour and buff leather. After the fashion of Van Dyck, he rests his right elbow on a pedestal on which lie his helmet and a gauntlet. It is a replica of the picture at Warwick Castle, which was engraved, in part, by Houbraeken; another, which Lodge engraved, belongs to Lord Hardwicke. Choice as it is, this portrait is not of the master's best time, but, nevertheless, it is a genuine specimen of the style of which there was a very inferior instance, such as we ventured to doubt, hanging on the same wall last year. The latter, even if it came from the same workshop, which was questionable, had little or nothing from the same hand that produced this solid and severe 'Earl of Warwick' and its fellow at Warwick, which is Smith's No. 549. The present version is in excellent condition, in perfect harmony with itself as to colour and tone, and, as to the face, an admirable study of character. The difference in the flesh painting of Nos. 125 and 124 must strike every one who studies them with technical knowledge. Another portrait of this nobleman by Van Dyck is at Petworth, and has not been exhibited; that before us was No. 204 in the Academy of 1873. Lord Leicester has likewise lent his whole-length James Stuart, Duke of Richmond and Lennox (126), one of a very numerous family, some of which, as is frequent with Van Dycks, differ in unimportant details of the attitudes and accessories. An indifferent one is at Wilton. Dr. Waagen was right in praising highly the nobly conceived and simple forms of the portrait before us, and its "flesh admirably treated in a tempered golden tone." The man himself is interesting, on account of his intense devotion to Charles I. He was one of the four peers who offered their lives to save that of their master, and one of the few who attended the king's interment at Windsor. Despite his high-heeled boots, he must have been a very little man, yet not much less than the king he served. There is a gentle melancholy in the face, which, though capable of enthusiasm, is weak, yet not so "foolish" as Carlyle was pleased to assert, and despite the preposterous disproportion of the wig, which his big head makes bigger, and his much-padded shoulders, it is easy to sympathize with him. The picture, like most Van Dycks, is in excellent condition. Except the king and queen, no member of the Court was so often painted by Van Dyck as the amiable Duke James, who, in happier times than those to which this sad-looking likeness belongs, figured in the guise of "Paris" holding an apple in his hand, as if "to judge of goddesses." Of this picture, which probably referred to a Court masque, there is a good version in the Louvre; Mr. Pole Carew and Lord Bristol (Grosvenor Gallery, 1887, No. 32) have others. One of these Evelyn saw in "one Mr. Tomb's house, near Hackney," May 8th, 1654, the year before the duke died. Lord Darnley has a whole-length in black, with the famous dog, whose warning saved his master's life, standing near him. The Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Richmond, Lord Clarendon, Lord Methuen, Lord Denbigh, Lord Carlisle, Lord Craven, the Hon. Mrs. Trollope, and Sir C. Strickland all own, or have owned, portraits, with or without the dog, of Duke James; and Faithorne, Hollar, Stent, Earlom, Vaughan, and Fry engraved one or another of them. This picture, the last of the Van Dycks of the year, brings us round again in the galleries of the Academy to the Reynoldses, about which we have already written. When one has been studying the Van Dycks, the Reynoldses seem insincere as well as unreal. It is impossible to turn from the noble pictures of the 'Doge of Genoa' and the 'Earl of Warwick,' or even from that of the 'Duke of Richmond,' and not see how feeble is modern portraiture compared with them. Compared with the Van Dycks, 'Lord Anherst,' by Sir Joshua (127), looks like an actor posing to be seen; 'Mrs. Powys and her Daughter' (128) resemble pictures of coloured shadows. Still less lifelike seems Gainsborough's 'Mrs. Robinson,' whose dog is more real than she. Romney's 'Mrs. Van der Gucht' (140) alone stands the test of a comparison with the Flemish pictures, and looks like real flesh and blood.

SALES.

Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods sold on the 17th inst. the following pictures: G. David, of Bruges, The Marriage of St. Catherine, 231l. R. Van der Weyden, A Triptych, with the Crucifixion and Procession to Calvary on the wings, and saints on the doors, 136l. S. Botticelli, The Madonna and Child, with a

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge sold the following prints last week: Hobbins and Ganderetta, after Gainsborough, by Tomkins, 15l. 15s. The Fair Moralist and her Pupil, after Cowday, by Bartolozzi, 15l. 15s. Lady Hamilton as "Nature," after Romney, by Meyer, in colours, 31l. Charlotte, Countess Cholmondeley, and her Son, after Hoppner, by C. Turner, 28l. Serena, after Romney, by J. R. Smith, 17l.

Messrs. Robinson & Fisher sold on the 15th inst. The Adoration, a picture of the Italian School, for 273l.

FINE-ART CURIOSITY.

SIR FREDERIC LEIGHTON is likely to be represented at the forthcoming Academy Exhibition by at least four, if not five pictures, more than ordinarily ambitious. The subject of 'The Spirit of the Summit' reminds us of Mr. Watts when he emblemizes some of the mysterious forces of nature. The life-size, statuesque figure of a stately virgin clad in voluminous white drapery sits on a lofty rock throne, on the highest peak of a mountain, with "eyes commencing with the stars" that glitter far above her in the dark-blue firmament. From the deep valleys below white clouds are slowly climbing. Her drapery has been designed with all the President's learning, care, taste, and skill. The coloration of the picture, an exercise in intense blues and various whites, is soft and harmonious, yet powerful. 'Summer Sleep' depicts the interior of a luxurious chamber, flushed with the warmest light of the afterglow, and distinguished by the depth, clearness, and breadth of its massed shadows, which serve as a foil to the graceful, nearly life-size figure of a damsel, who lies supine upon the broad margin of a marble tank filled with bluish water, which reflects the lustre of the sky seen without. The sleeper's draperies veil, without marring, the fine and lengthy lines of her body and limbs, her virginal contours, and the elegance of her attitude. Sculptures emblematic of repose and silence adorn the place, and an opening in the wall behind the sleeper reveals a shadowy prospect. In 'The Armlet' the chief figure is a tall and stately Greekish damsel draped from head to foot in a semi-diaphanous tissue of a pale primrose colour. Lifting one elbow, she slips along her rounded arm a large and massive bracelet of gold, at which, while thus fitting it, she looks attentively, her head being thrown slightly backwards and sideways. She has risen from the chair on which she has thrown her outer garment, and stands nearly erect, while between two lofty columns of the background we catch glimpses of trees of the darkest foliage, of vines that autumn has begun to tinge, and the sky. At the lady's feet a little child holds a casket, from which the bracelet was taken. 'A Soothsayeress' is the title of another important picture, in which Sir Frederic has represented a large-limbed dame, attired in ample robes of white, and half reclining and half sitting in a silver throne, while one of her strong arms rests upon the elbow of the chair, and the other sustains her head. Her pale and moody, yet majestic face suggests to us that she is brooding upon fortune and the future. It is a stately Michael Angélesque figure, which impresses the spectator by its grave, abstracted, and somewhat stern aspect. She sits on a raised platform that is set in a large niche, or the ambo of a temple, the walls of which are covered with silver, where mysterious gleams and shadows seem to play. At her side is a tall, richly sculptured tripod of silver, on which a sullen fire is slowly burning. At her feet lies a long branch of golden laurel.

THE Report of the Director of the National Gallery, 1893, has been published, and, besides details we have already set before our readers, such as the names and numbers of pictures added to the collection, urgently repeats the appeal of the Trustees and Director for the enlargement of the building. The practice of hanging paintings on screens has, the report says, now reached its utmost limit, and, "if the present system of classification is to be maintained, there is absolutely no more room available." Details of cleaning, repairing, and varnishing pictures are given, as well as notes on the catalogues published, and the numbers of the visitors who have used the galleries. The decease of Lord Northbourne caused a vacancy which led to Mr. Heseltine becoming a Trustee. More than 13,000 catalogues have been sold during the year.

No. 1399, a new Terburg, being the third in the public collection, has been added to the National Gallery and hung on a screen in the Octagon Hall. It is 'A Portrait of a Gentleman,' who wears a tall steeple hat of felt, trunk hose, a cloak, and square-toed shoes, all of black, a wide, falling white collar, and a long, light-brown wig. He stands between a table and a chair covered with red cloth. The background is a rather dull olive-brown. The newly acquired sketch by Rembrandt to which we referred last week is No. 1400, and represents in many figures, with the Saviour in the centre, 'Christ before Pilate.' It is a design in monochrome, or nearly so, manifestly made for a very important picture, conceived with great vigour and abundant power of dramatizing.

THE gold medal of the Institute of Architects, 1894, has been conferred upon Sir F. Leighton, who has, we understand, accepted a distinction which Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Norman Shaw declined to receive—the former because he is not an architect, and the latter because he is one. Awards of this medal are made annually, and among the recipients have been Cockerell, Donaldson, Sir G. G. Scott, M. Viollet-le-Duc, Street, Mr. Waterhouse, Mr. Butterfield, and Mr. Pearson.

MANY of our readers will wish Mr. Watts many happy returns of his birthday. He was seventy-six yesterday (Friday); he is in the country, in excellent health, and happily painting.

MR. ARMITAGE has given his large picture 'Herod's Birthday Feast' to the Art Gallery, Guildhall; it was at the Academy in 1876, and will be included in the forthcoming City Loan Exhibition.

TO-DAY (Saturday) has been appointed by the Fine-Art Society for the private view of a number of water-colour drawings of "Paris in 1894," by Mr. J. Fulleylove, to see which the public will be admitted on Monday next.

THE Trustees of the British Museum will shortly issue the third volume of the 'Catalogue of the Cuneiform Tablets in the Kouyunjik Collection of the British Museum,' by Dr. Charles Bezold.

Messrs. BOUSSEON, VALADON & Co. have formed a collection of paintings by Mr. P. W. Steer, and appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of them. The public will be admitted on Monday next.

THE Provincial Museum of the Mark of Brandenburg has been presented with a collection of portraits of Frederick the Great, the gathering together of which has occupied the donor several years. There are 520 different portraits. Nearly all of them are contemporary engravings of Frederick's time; many of them are unique; and 300 different artists are represented in the collection.

It is announced that the promoters of the exhibition at the Champ de Mars have decided to limit to eight the works to be received from any one artist. In the Salon proper no artist may exhibit more than two examples of his skill in any single method of art, but he may send two paintings, two sculptures, and two engravings.

PRADIER's eminent pupil, M. Jacques Léonard Maillet, is dead, aged seventy-one years. He won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1847 with 'Télémaque rapportant les Cendres d'Hippas à Phalante,' and, with 'Agrippina and Caligula,' a Première Médaille in 1853 at the Salon; a appel of the same in 1857; and in 1861 the Legion of Honour. Among his other works are 'Agrippine portant les Cendres de Germanicus,' 'La Réprimande,' 'La Science,' and 'L'Abondance,' the last two of which are in the Musée du Louvre. In addition, he obtained the prize ex æquo for his 'Voltaire,' a very noteworthy piece indeed.

LADY EASTLAKE's executor informs us that a picture by Rembrandt, lately bought for the National Gallery, was purchased direct from him, and not, as we were informed, at a public sale.

THE Chronique des Arts tells us that the new version of M. Mercie's statue of Jeanne d'Arc, the original of which we have all admired in the Place des Pyramides, Paris, will be completed in two years. It is a commission to the sculptor from the Conseil Général des Vosges, to be wrought in marble, and erected at Domrémy; it differs considerably as to the costume from the original, and the plaster model will be sent to the next Salon.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Popular Concerts.

ON March 7th, 1891, a pianoforte concerto by Mr. E. Burmeister, leading professor at the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, was performed by his wife at the Crystal Palace, and received fairly favourable comment. Last Saturday another and, in some respects, more ambitious work from the same pen was presented to notice. This is entitled 'Symphonic Fantasy,' and is an attempted illustration in music of a picture by R. Henneberg, 'Die Jagd nach dem Glück.' The score is in two parts, the first being headed "Happy time of youth, and love scene," and the second, "The temptation, the chase, and death." The picture is described as presenting "a youthful knight of noble birth pursuing the fleeting form of Fortune, portrayed as a nude female of alluring but fatal beauty. The knight is urging a spirited horse forward over the prostrate body of his bride, and madly rushing toward a frail and constantly narrowing bridge, at the further end of which Fortune hovers over a bubble. Mean time Death, mounted on a weird and fiery steed, gains on the youth and reaches to grasp his victim, who in a moment more will plunge from the breaking bridge into the yawning abyss." In prefacing his illustration of this ghastly theme by movements suggesting youth and love Mr. Burmeister has followed the example of Raff in his 'Lenore' Symphony. The work is in three distinct sections, and is built upon a series of short motives which reappear in each movement, thus giving the effect of unity to the entire design. It is very cleverly put together, and the "love scene" may be described as beautiful; but, on the whole, it is made rather than inspired music. Admirably rendered by Mr. Manne's orchestra, the work was received with favour, but scarcely with enthusiasm. Lady Halle played magnificently in Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and in Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's 'Highland Ballad'; and the programme included Sterndale Bennett's Overture 'Paradise and the Peri,' and Weber's to 'Oberon.' Miss Evangeline Florence was highly acceptable in airs by Schubert and Gounod.

There is little to be said concerning last Saturday's Popular Concert, though a well-diversified programme was presented. The concerted works were Mozart's ninth and last Quintet for strings, in E flat; Dvorák's Pianoforte Trio in F minor, Op. 65; and Brahms's Sonata in A, for piano and violin, Op. 100. In these we have examples of classical, modern Slavonic, and modern German art at their best. Miss Fanny Davies played Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Op. 35, No. 3, in which the composer's affection for Bach strongly asserts itself. Mr. Santley greatly pleased in a song from his own pen, "The old, old time," and Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence."

Monday's programme was of a more speculative nature, if such a term may be allowed. Mlle. Eibenschütz introduced for the first time three movements of a Pianoforte Suite in A by Moszkowsky, Op. 50. Why the fourth should have been omitted it is difficult to say. The examples given are, like all this composer's music, written in a refined and elegant manner, and perhaps more suitable for home use than the concert room. In the first movement M. Moszkowsky's intention would seem to have been to imitate the old Italian masters; and if so he has accomplished it with fair success. Herr Joachim presented, also for the first time, the second and third movements, 'Abendglocken' and 'Ballade,' from his set of pieces for piano and violin, Op. 5, composed many years ago. The 'Evening Bells' piece is written in very expressive style, and the other is vigorous and effective. Herr Joachim's playing was faultless alike in tone, phrasing, and intonation. Not for several years has he been in such splendid "form" as at present. Schumann's Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3, and Brahms's Trio in E flat, Op. 40, for piano, violin, and horn (the horn part being played on the violoncello, as sanctioned by the composer), were included in the programme. In connexion with the last-named work we read in the book that "Curiously enough the master's catalogue indicates equal reluctance to employ brass or wood in any association apart from the orchestra. We find a Funeral Hymn for chorus and wind, Op. 13, and four songs for female chorus, two horns, and harp, Op. 17. But these are the only cases." Apparently the writer has never heard of the Clarinet Trio, Op. 114, not to mention the Clarinet Quintet, Op. 115, which has been so frequently played since its first performance at these concerts as recently as March 28th, 1892. Miss Gwladys Wood displayed an excellent method and a refined style in Handel's air "If guiltless blood," from 'Susannah,' Schubert's 'An die Musik,' and a pleasing song in the old style, 'Queen and Huntress,' by Mr. W. S. Rockstro.

The Art of Music. By C. Hubert H. Parry. (Kegan Paul & Co.)—This rather curious volume is not a treatise on the development of music, nor a musical history, but rather a series of essays, in which the growth of the most modern of the arts and the special work accomplished by several of the great masters are dealt with in the intelligent manner that would be expected from a musician of such rare attainments as Dr. Parry. Chapters are devoted to scales, folk-music, incipient harmony, the rise of secular music, combinations of old methods and new principles, balance of expression and design, and modern tendencies, in all of which, although the author may not have anything new to tell us, he proves himself a deep thinker with a firm belief that music has advanced since the classic age of the symphony and the sonata. His last chapter, "Modern Phases of Opera," naturally deals chiefly with Wagner, and might have proceeded from the pen of the Bayreuth reformer. Here, for example, is Dr. Parry's severe portrait of Meyerbeer:—

"He did not care in the least whether his details were commonplace or not. His scores look elaborate and full of work, but the details are the commonest arpeggios, familiar and hackneyed types of accompaniment, scales, and obvious rhythms. The element of wholesome musical sincerity is wanting in him, but the power of astonishing and bewildering is almost unlimited. For instance, when a situation requires something impressive, and he has nothing musical to supply, he takes refuge in a cadenza for the clarinet or some other instrument, and the attention of the public is engaged by their interest in the skill of the performer, and forgets to notice that it has no possible relation to the significance of the situation."

This is trenchant, but its truth cannot be disputed. Of Wagner's mode of utterance it is said:—

"Of the method itself it may be said that it is the logical outcome of the efforts of the long line of previous composers, and the most completely organized system for the purposes of musical expression that the world has ever yet seen."

But Dr. Parry is by no means one-sided in his views. Here is one more quotation:—

"The song from the Music Hall may be excellent and characteristic, and often is; the music of people who have every opportunity to be refined and cultivated may be detestably bad, and often is. There is an infinite variety of moods which admit of being expressed, from the noble, aspiring, human sincerity of a great nature like Brahms's to the rank, impudent, false sentimentality of impostors who shall be nameless."

The book is not one from which the student could derive much technical instruction; but it may be read with some degree of profit as well as pleasure. Actual errors are few and far between. Mention is made of Beethoven's 'Engedi,' a work which, it is needless to say, is only an adaptation; and the same composer's Sonata in E minor, Op. 90, is spoken of as Op. 91.

Musical Society.

The first prospectus of the Birmingham Festival, to be held in October next, has been issued. The new works promised are an oratorio, 'King Saul,' by Dr. Hubert Parry; a cantata, 'The Swan and the Skylark,' by the late Goring Thomas, found in a complete state among the deceased composer's papers, save as to the orchestration, which will be added by Prof. Villiers Stanford; and a 'Stabat Mater,' by Mr. Henschel. 'Elijah' and 'The Messiah' retain their accustomed places, and other works of importance are Cherubini's Mass in D, Berlioz's rarely heard 'Te Deum,' a Mass of Palestrina, and Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony. The dates of the festival are October 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th.

So much interest is being taken in the Wagner concert to be directed by Herr Felix Mottl at the Queen's Hall on April 17th, that endeavours were made to secure the Karlsruhe Kapellmeister for a second performance, at which he should conduct works by Berlioz and some of the classical masters. Unfortunately his leave of absence could not be prolonged, and the matter has, therefore, to be postponed until a future occasion.

THE repetition performance of 'Pagliacci' and 'Cavalleria Rusticana' at the Queen's Hall last Saturday afternoon was, in some respects, artistically more successful than the first, the orchestra and chorus being decidedly more at home in their work. Miss Ella Russell, Miss Greta Williams, Miss Damian, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Oudin repeated their previous successes, and Mr. Payne Clarke displayed a fine though somewhat vibratory tenor voice as Canio in Leoncavallo's opera. Mr. Braxton Smith and Mr. Arthur Oswald, who were unable to appear, were efficiently replaced by Mr. Lawrence Kellie and Mr. Arthur Appleby.

At last, it seems, there is a likelihood of London musicians being able to hear the pianist Herr Rosenthal, who by many good judges is regarded as the greatest living executant. Mr. N. Vert is endeavouring to make terms with him for a series of recitals after Easter at St. James's Hall.

THE death of that veteran operatic vocalist Mr. Aynsley Cook, which occurred at Liverpool on Friday last week, should not pass unrecorded. At first associated with the Pyne and Harrison English Opera Company at Covent Garden, more than thirty years ago, Mr. Aynsley Cook has ever since held a recognized position on the lyric stage. His voice was bass, of agreeable quality, but he was most successful in such parts as Giacomo in 'Fra Diavolo' and Devilshoop in 'The Bohemian Girl.' He had attained the age of sixty-two, and may be said to have died in harness.

MR. CHARLES MANNERS and his wife (Madame Fanny Moody) have just received a flattering offer to appear in opera at St. Petersburg next month, but have been constrained to decline it owing to engagements nearer home.

THE Stock Exchange Orchestral Society gave one of its admirable concerts at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening. Under Mr. George Kitchen's direction exceedingly creditable performances were secured of Beethoven's Symphony in A flat, No. 4, and Weber's Overture to 'Oberon.' Mr. Hamish McCunn's ballad 'The Ship o' the Fiend' was conducted by the composer. A pretty but extremely unpretentious little piece, called 'Cradle Song,' by Mr. Santley, was also conducted by its composer. Another novelty was a cleverly written ballad for baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra, 'The Song of Harold Harfager,' being a setting of Scott's words by Mr. John Pointer. The solo part was well sung by Mr. H. F. Chamen. The rest of the programme does not call for remark.

THE death is announced of the once famous violinist Ernest Camille Sivori, at the age of seventy-nine years. He began the study of his instrument when he was five years old under Restano, and at eight Paganini took him in hand. At twelve he visited London as a "prodigy," and afterwards, as a mature artist, or rather virtuoso, he frequently appeared here, his last visit, if we remember rightly, being in 1869, when he led at the Monday Popular Concerts. He possessed extraordinary executive powers, but his tone was thin, and therefore he did not shine in classical works. In pieces of a brilliant, showy style he was, perhaps, on the other hand, Paganini's greatest successor.

THE deaths are announced of two Spanish musicians: Señor Arrieta, Director of the Conservatoire at Madrid, and Señor Barbieri, the composer of more than fifty operas and operettas, which, however, are unknown in this country. Señor Barbieri did much to popularize the music of Wagner and other German masters in Spain.

DRAMA

Specimens of Greek Tragedy. Translated by Goldwin Smith, D.O.L. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH's dabbings in the classics have been more extensive than we thought when reviewing, a few weeks ago, his little volume of 'Bay Leaves.' That modest selection of versions from the Latin poets has been quickly followed by two companion, but stouter, volumes of translations from the Greek tragedians. As before, Mr. Goldwin Smith has contented himself with picking out favourite passages, refraining from the higher and harder task of producing a complete version of any play or plays; but the selected passages are held together by brief prose outlines, so that the reader who is unacquainted with the drama can gather a good idea of the whole. As to the success of the venture we should be sorry to speak too definitely. The translations are not so adequate as those in the earlier volume; but, on the other hand, the originals are far greater. The Latin poets, with the exception of Virgil and the harder parts of Horace and Catullus, with which Mr. Goldwin Smith did not meddle, require in their translator nothing higher than culture and literary taste; the Greek tragedians need a poet, and the greater the better. From a scholar and an accomplished man of letters, like Mr. Goldwin Smith, one is sure to get sound and tasteful versions; but the illuminating touch of poetry is not at his command. Perhaps this deficiency is made more conspicuous by the character of some of the passages chosen. Mr. Goldwin Smith is shy of the choruses, in which the poetry of the original will sometimes carry off even an uninspired translation, and he is unduly fond of stichomythia, which is just the part of a Greek play which it is least possible to represent adequately to a modern audience. In some cases, also, fine passages have been passed over in favour of others less effective. Thus not only are the great choruses (with a slight exception) and the lyric part of Cassandra's prophecy omitted from the 'Agamemnon,' but also the two famous speeches of Clytemnestra, of which one describes the succession of beacon fires announcing the fall of Troy, and the other the condition of the captured city. The 'Eumenides' also is inadequately represented, and one of the best speeches in the 'Edipus Colonus' (ll. 607-628) is rather strangely passed over. As a rule, however, the finest passages in each of the great plays are given, and, granting Mr. Goldwin Smith's postulate of the almost entire avoidance of choruses, there is very little fault to be found with his selection. As a specimen of his style—always readable and sometimes really good—the following speech may be taken from the 'Hippolytus' (ll. 73-87):—

Lady, this garland I have twined for thee
Of flowers fresh gathered from the virgin mead,
Where never shepherd dares to feed his sheep
Nor mower's scythe is seen; only the bee
In springtide through that holy meadow flits,
And chastity, with clear streams, waters it.
They in whose hearts dwells native purity
Unharm'd may cull the blossoms from that mead,

"A little buoyancy, a little of the joy of earth, of the spirit of Mr. Meredith—nay, or of Rabelais—what is the use of wishing these things to a talent radically different? It is much if such a talent can end, as Mr. Gissing's seems likely to, in a creed that is somewhat dreary, but still strenuous, self-contained, and not desperate nor without dignity. Doubtless the sense of an advance in creative power is one of the best satisfactions that can come to a writer of this temper; we believe that the present novel warrants such satisfaction."—Manchester Guardian.

FREDERICK BOYLE.

ABOUT ORCHIDS. A Chat. By FREDERICK BOYLE. With 8 Coloured Illustrations, reduced from the superb Drawings by Mr. Moon. Large crown 8vo. 8s.

"All orchid-lovers will feel bound to possess it, and read it for themselves.....And, having perused it, they will want to have it within reach on the most accessible shelf of their garden-library."—Gardener's Chronicle.
 "Mr. Boyle has done for orchids what Dean Hole did for roses.....Mr. Boyle's fascinating book, thanks to the author's skilful style, is full of interest, and makes a book that no intelligent person will lay down till finished."—Academy.

The Hon. Mrs. GREVILLE-NUGENT.

A LAND of MOSQUES and MARABOUTS. By the Hon. Mrs. GREVILLE-NUGENT. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 14s.

"The lady has a story to tell, and tells it brilliantly. Listening to her we seem to hear 'the tinkle of sequins and the hum of derbunks.' Her pages glow with colour, and reflect both the light and the shades of native life in Barbary."—Pail Mail Gazette.
 "Mrs. Greville-Nugent has a very agreeable pen, pointed with a very pretty wit.....A brighter volume of its sort we have not seen for a long time.....The unrestrained gaiety and zest of her pages will commend them to hundreds who do not care a sham sequin about ordinary books of travel."—Daily Chronicle.

PRINCE HENRI D'ORLÉANS.

AROUND TONKIN and SIAM. By PRINCE HENRI D'ORLÉANS. Translated by C. B. PITMAN. With 28 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 14s.

The ABBEYS, CASTLES, and ANCIENT HALLS of ENGLAND and WALES: their Legendary Lore and Popular History. By JOHN TIMBS. A Superior and Revised Edition. Illustrated by 19 superb Photographures, reproduced by Hantzschel, of Munich.

"This work has never taken so sumptuous and delightful a form as the publishers have now given to it. They have not only subjected it to careful revision, enlargement, and rearrangement, but to a process of pictorial illustration which will give universal satisfaction."—Globe.

In 6 vols. 8½ by 5, cloth gilt, in cloth case, 17. 1s.

The LANSDOWNE POCKET SHAKESPEARE. Printed on the finest India paper, red line. Also kept in best French morocco, in lock case; Turkey morocco, in elegant folding case; full calf, in elegant folding case.

This Edition is very finely printed by Morrison & Gibb, on the choicest India paper, and forms the most compact edition of Shakespeare's Works published. It contains the whole of the Plays and Poems, as well as a Memoir and Glossary.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

Mr. Gladstone.—The SPEECHES and PUBLIC ADDRESSES of the Right

Hon. W. R. GLADSTONE, M.P. With Notes. Edited by A. W. HUTTON, M.A. (Librarian of the Gladstone Library), and H. J. COHEN, M.A. With Portrait. 8vo. Vol. IX. 12s. 6d.

Messrs. METHUEN announce that they are about to issue, in ten volumes, an Authorized Collection of Mr. Gladstone's Speeches, the work being undertaken with his sanction and under his superintendence. Notes and Introductions will be added.

In view of the political situation it is proposed to issue Vols. IX. and X., which will include the Speeches of the last seven or eight years, immediately, and then to proceed with the earlier volumes. Volume X. is already published.

Messrs. METHUEN announce that they are about to publish, in ONE VOLUME, a FOURTH and CHEAPER EDITION of 'BARABBAS.'

Marie Corelli.—BARABBAS: a Dream of the World's Tragedy. By MARIE CORELLI, Author of 'A Romance of Two Worlds.' Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s. [In the press.

Miss Corelli's new romance has been received with much disapprobation by the secular papers, and with warm welcome by the religious papers. By the former she has been accused of blasphemous and bad taste; "a gory nightmare"; "a hideous travesty"; "grotesque vulgarisation"; "unworthy of criticism"; "vulgar redundancy"; "slovenly details"—these are some of the secular howlers of speech. On the other hand, the Guardian praises "the dignity of its conceptions, the reserve round the Central Figure, the fine imagery of the scene and circumstance, so much that is elevating and devout"; the Illustrated Church News styles the book "reverent and artistic, broad based on the rock of our common nature, and appealing to what is best in it"; the Christian World says it is written "by one who has more than conventional reverence, who has tried to tell the story that it may be read again with open and attentive eyes"; the Church of England Trident welcomes "a book which teems with faith without any appearance of irreverence." Lastly, Canon WILDERBONNE says it is "a high-minded and very powerful effort to revivify, by the legitimate use of the imagination, a time-honoured history.....The romance cannot harm any one, and it may cause many to re-read and consider the Inspired Record."

THIRTEENTH EDITION OF 'DODO.'

E. F. Benson.—DODO: a Detail of the Day. By E. F. BENSON. Thirteenth Edition. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

Few novels of late years have been so successful as 'Dodo.' In its two-volume form it has passed through ten editions, and has attracted by its brilliance universal attention. The best critics have been cordial in their praise. The Guardian spoke of 'Dodo' as "unusually clever and interesting"; the Spectator called it "a delightfully witty sketch of society"; the Speaker said the dialogue was "a perpetual feast of epigram and paradox"; the Athenæum spoke of the author as "a writer of quite exceptional ability"; the Dundee praised his "amazing cleverness"; the World said the book was "brilliantly written"; and half a dozen papers have declared that there was "not a dull page in the two volumes."

Gilchrist.—The STONE DRAGON. By MURRAY GILCHRIST. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A volume of stories of power so weird and original as to ensure them a ready welcome. "The author's faults are atoned for by certain positive and admirable merits. The romances have not their counterpart in modern literature, and to read them is a unique experience."—National Observer.

F. S. Carew.—JIM B. By F. S. CAREW. Crown 8vo. linen, 2s. 6d.

An unconventional and pathetic tale.

METHUEN'S HALF-CROWN NOVELS.

A DOUBLE KNOT. By G. MANVILLE FENN, Author of 'Eli's Children.'

Oscar Browning.—GUELPHS and Ghibellines: a Short History of Medieval Italy, A.D. 1250-1400. By OSCAR BROWNING, Fellow and Tutor of King's Coll., Cambridge. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

"A very able little book."—Westminster Gazette.

"We cannot speak too highly of this admirable work."—Westminster Review.

Dixon.—ENGLISH POETRY from BLAKE to BROWNING. By W. M. DIXON, M.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"Scholarly in conception, and full of sound and suggestive criticism."—Times.

"The book is remarkable for freshness of thought expressed in graceful language."—Manchester Examiner.

O'Grady.—The STORY of IRELAND. By STANDISH O'GRADY, Author of 'Finn and his Companions.' Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"Novel and very fascinating history. Wonderfully alluring."—Carl Examiner.

"Most delightful, most stimulating. Its very humour, its original imaginings, its perfectly unique history, make it one of the freshest, breeziest volumes."—Methodist Times.

"A survey at once graphic, acute, and quaintly written."—Times.

Ibsen.—BRAND. A Drama by HENRIK IBSEN. Translated by WILLIAM WILSON. Second and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"The greatest world-poem of the nineteenth century next to 'Faust.' 'Brand' will have an astonishing interest for Englishmen. It is in the same set with 'Agamemnon,' with 'Lear,' with the literature that we now instinctively regard as high and holy."—Daily Chronicle.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION SERIES.—New Volumes.

A MANUAL of ELECTRICAL SCIENCE. By GEORGE J. BURCH, M.A. With numerous Illustrations. 3s. A Practical, Popular, and Full Handbook.

"Solid, sound, and free from technicality."—Scotsman.

"There are few books in which so much information is imparted in a more popular manner."—Nature.

A TEXT-BOOK of AGRICULTURAL BOTANY. By M. C. POTTER, M.A. F.L.S. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

"Professor Potter is endowed with the art of lucid expression."—Speaker.

"One of the best text-books that has come under our notice. Admirably illustrated."—Newcastle Chronicle.

The CHEMISTRY of FIRE. By M. M. PATTISON MUIR, M.A. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.

An Exposition of the Elementary Principles of Chemistry.

"A charming book, with thoroughness in exposition and closeness in scientific reasoning."—Bristol Mercury.

"The book will yield more instruction than a hundred others of the same size."—Manchester Guardian.

The VAULT of HEAVEN. A Popular Introduction to Astronomy. By R. A. GREGORY. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"One of the most useful guides to astronomy which has come under our notice. Simply written, and of remarkable accuracy."—Birmingham Gazette.

"A model of a book."—Glasgow Herald.

"An admirable introduction to modern physical astronomy."—Nature.

METEOROLOGY. The Elements of Weather and Climate. By H. N. DICKSON, F.R.S.E. F.R.Met.Soc. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.

"A useful, compact, and dependable treatise."—Scotsman.

"An admirable text-book and a sufficient introduction to the science of weather."—Daily Telegraph.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS AT THE LIBRARIES.

Ready this day.
THE SECOND EDITION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'AN OLD MAID'S LOVE.'
THE GREATER GLORY.

By MAARTEN MAARTENS.

Author of 'The Sin of Joost Avelingh,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The novel is excellent from its breadth of view, its insight into human motive, and shows an increase rather than the reverse of the artistic skill which sets its author apart from other writers of romance perhaps quite as gifted as himself. The work is also rich in epigram and humour, both incisive and original, and will rank among its author's best efforts."—Morning Post.

"The appearance of a new novel by Maarten Maartens may fairly be called an event of importance in literature. The Dutch novelist has made his right to stand with our best authors. No review can do justice to the many deep and delicate studies in this careful, brilliant, and picturesque book."—Daily Chronicle.

"A most ingenious and clever novel, full of good things. Contains most admirable character-sketches."—Daily Telegraph.

"A novel which can be read with genuine enjoyment by the most critical, which has a charm of style quite its own, and has enriched the world of fiction with new characters, destined to more than passing fame."—Observer.

"A serious and striking production."—Scotsman.

"Has high merits of pathos, of humour, of artistic colour, and pictorial suggestion."—Full Mail Gazette.

"Has much that is charming in it, and bears the distinctive marks of the writer's genius."—World.

Now ready.

THE ROMANCE OF SHERE NOTE.

By PERCY HUNLUND.

Author of 'In Black and White.' 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Not only a story of singular ingenuity and power, but an album, so to speak, of brilliant character-sketches, graphic word-pictures, and trenchant epigrams. It is a book, in short, affording abundant proof that its author is entitled to rank in the first flight of contemporary novelists."—Daily Telegraph.

Now ready.

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF 'THE SCOTTS OF BISHOPSTON.'

A DEVOTED COUPLE.

By J. MASTERMAN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

Now ready.

THE VICAR OF LANTHWAITE.

By LILY WATSON. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"This pretty story is a plea for tolerance and charity among the 'clashing of the creeds.' There is much that is touching in the book, much simple pathos, and bits of quaint humour. A bright and pleasant novel."—Full Mail Gazette.

"A thoughtful, well-conceived, and well-constructed work."—Scotsman.

Now ready.

BRITOMART. By Mrs. Herbert

MARTIN. Author of 'Bonnie Lesley,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"A novel powerfully conceived, and full of strong scenes and strong characters."—Academy.

"A noble novel. The heroine of the touching, realistic and deeply-thought-out story is a rarely beautiful and winning example of womanhood in its fairest and most wonderful aspects. The story is as charming as it is good."—World.

"A truly beautiful story. It is the purpose of this delightful book to demonstrate the power of a pure and valiant woman to make the world better. 'Britomart' will rank among the most noteworthy literary productions of the year."—Daily Telegraph.

"A thoroughly good novel."—Speaker.

Now ready.

SPEEDWELL. By Lady Guendolen

RAMSDEN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"This graceful and pathetic book will please all readers. The story of woman's love and man's inconstancy is sweetly and freshly told."—Full Mail Gazette.

BY DR. KENEALY.

MOLLY and her MAN-O'-WAR. By

Dr. ARABELLA KENEALY. Author of 'Dr. Janet of Harley Street.' In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

SECOND EDITION.

DIANA TEMPEST. By Mary Chol-

MONDELEY. Author of 'Sir Charles Danvers,' &c. In 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Of Miss Cholmondeley's clever novels, 'Diana Tempest' is quite the cleverest."—Times.

"'Diana Tempest' is a delightful heroine, fresh, courageous, and true. Colonel Tempest and his son Archie are clever sketches of character. The story is thoroughly well worked out; old Mrs. Courtney is a delightful old lady."—Guardian.

PHILIP'S SYSTEMATIC ATLAS: PHYSICAL AND POLITICAL.

SPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR THE USE OF HIGHER SCHOOLS AND PRIVATE STUDENTS.

Containing over 250 Maps and Diagrams, in 52 Plates, with an Explanatory Introduction, and a Complete Index of 12,000 Names.

By E. G. RAVENSTEIN, F.R.G.S.

EXTRACT FROM EDITORS' PREFACE.

This Atlas is intended to meet the requirements of Pupils in Higher Schools, of Teachers, and of other Students of Geography, for whom neither the ordinary School Atlas nor the general reference Atlas is entirely adequate. We trust that it will also appeal to that considerable section of the General Public which now takes interest in the geographical aspects of Politics and Commerce.

By the title which we have given to it, we claim that, unlike many "New" Atlases, this is not an indiscriminate collection of maps and fragments of maps which have for years done duty in other Atlases, but that it has been built up on a carefully considered system, and that every map has been specially constructed to take its place in the general plan.

So far as limits of space would allow, we have sought to do justice to all departments of Geography, but more especially to Physical Geography, which is the foundation of every other branch of the subject, and indispensable to a thorough mastery of its Political and Commercial divisions.

We believe that the general physical maps, forming the first part of the Atlas, will be found to suffice for all the ordinary requirements of the student. For much of the information embodied in them we are, of course, indebted to our predecessors, but many new features have been introduced, and much care has been taken to incorporate recent advances of knowledge.

Of the British Isles and of most of the continents we give two plates on the same scale, the one illustrating the physical, the other the political features. It has been possible in other cases to devote only a single plate to each country or region, and in such cases we have often found it necessary to simplify the Political Boundaries, which are indicated by red lines. Further details, however, may usually be observed by referring to the special political map of the larger region of which the country under consideration is a part.

In no case has the delineation stopped with the Political Boundaries, full details of the neighbouring countries being invariably given as far as permitted by the extent of the plate. Thus, the Maps of Europe include the whole of the Mediterranean, with considerable portions of North Africa and Asia; the border lands of England and Scotland can be studied on the same map.

In the interests especially of the student of history we have introduced, as far as possible, maps of well-defined natural regions, such as the Basin of the Danube, the Balkan Peninsula, and the countries surrounding the Baltic.

In planning the Atlas care has been taken to give due prominence to those countries and regions specially interesting to British students. Thus, ten plates are devoted to the British Islands, while the British Colonies and "spheres of influence" are shown on a larger scale than is usually employed in an Atlas of this kind.

Great care has been exercised in the selection of names. For certain purposes, there is no doubt that the fewer names there are on a map the better. The omission of many of the names in this Atlas would have improved the appearance of the maps, and would have rendered them more graphic. We have had, however, to consider practical purposes, and an Atlas with a scanty supply of names would hardly have met the requirements of teachers and students.

In the spelling of names we have followed the rules laid down by the Royal Geographical Society, which have in the main been adopted in the United States, and even by the Governments of Germany and France. But to obviate all difficulty we have given the "popular" spelling in the Index of 12,000 names which accompanies the Atlas.

Due attention has been paid to the practical or human aspects of Geography, and especially to Commercial Geography. The principal Railways are indicated on all the Political Maps, and a Map of the World has been more especially designed to show the Commercial Highways by land and by sea. There are Maps of every country, showing Density of Population and Distribution of Languages. There are also special Maps, showing the Distribution of Plants and Animals, and in the construction of these particular attention has been paid to such Products as are useful to man, and enter largely into Commerce.

Such are a few of the special features of the Systematic Atlas. The general idea which has governed its compilation has been the provision of a body of matter so ordered that Teachers may easily demonstrate those contrasts and comparisons which make of Geography, as is now generally recognised, a study of high disciplinary value.

The Journal of Education for March, 1894, says:—"We must congratulate Messrs. Philip & Son upon the fact that it has been possible to bring together Mr. Scott Keltie, Mr. Mackinder, and Mr. Ravenstein for the production of an atlas. And not only must we congratulate the publishers but also the advanced student of geography, to whom it appeals, for it appears to us to be far and away the amplest and clearest delineation of the world with which we are acquainted, exhibiting very strikingly the great advances that geographical exposition has made in the last few years."

LITERATURE

Travels in India a Hundred Years Ago: with a Visit to the United States. By Thomas Twining. Edited by the Rev. W. H. Twining. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

So far as publishers and printers are concerned, this volume is worthy of praise. The editor also has not been wanting in the care required for the task of seeing the author's manuscript through the press. Barring a few misprints of small importance, his text leaves nothing to desire. But it is to be regretted that his loving labour went no further than a careful supervision of the letterpress. A work of this sort, which deals so largely with historic scenes and characters of a century ago, needed editing in the style of which the new edition of Sleeman's 'Rambles and Recollections' affords an apt example. To take one instance out of many, the author, in pp. 274-84, describes his friendly reception at Koil by General de Boigne, the famous Savoyard who organized and led to victory the regular brigades in Madhaji Sindhia's army. A few brief foot-notes supplied by a competent hand would have enlarged the reader's acquaintance with the places and persons mentioned in the text.

It is true that Twining's volume is bulky enough as it is. But room for a sufficient number of pertinent notes might easily have been found by omitting most of the "detached narratives," and even, if need arose, by some curtailment of the first chapter. The book would thus have gained considerably in historic value, with no appreciable loss of interest as a record of personal adventure.

The diaries and other papers, now for the first time printed in this volume, were written by Mr. Twining, who, at the age of sixteen, sailed to Bengal in 1792 as a "writer" in the service of the East India Company. He seems to have been a kindly, thoughtful, intelligent youth, of good principles, industrious habits, and enlightened tastes, who readily adapted himself to his new surroundings, and set himself from the first to gain a competent knowledge of the native languages. At

Madras, where he spent the first week of an Indian August, young Twining had his first taste of a plantain, which he had mistaken for "a sort of sausage," saw the Indian method of raising water from a well, wondered at the feats of the native jugglers, and slept inside mosquito curtains. He became acquainted with Col. Barry Close, lately returned from serving in Cornwallis's successful campaign against Tippoo, and was introduced to the two sons of Tippoo, who had been carried off as hostages to Madras. The younger prince, hardly eight years old, pleased him most. He was "fair, with large handsome eyes. He was very cheerful and polite, talked a great deal to us, and very sensibly. When he heard that we should see Lord Cornwallis, he desired, with tears in his eyes, to be remembered to him. Tell Lord Cornwallis that he is always with me."

Twining was surprised to find how very little of the country around Madras belonged to the East India Company. It is strange to think that only a century ago the Company owned no territory worth naming either in Southern or Western India, or anywhere outside Bengal and Behar. When Thomas Twining returned home in 1805, the Company's rule extended over half the country; and before his death in 1860 all India, from Peshawar to Cape Comorin, had become an appanage of the British Crown.

On his way up the Hugli, as he neared Calcutta, the young civilian noticed the "handsome villas" along Garden Reach. The City of Palaces, "with its lofty, detached, flat-roofed mansions, and the masts of its innumerable shipping," soon came into view, while the "elegant fortress" of Fort William with its extensive ramparts filled in "the foreground of this beautiful perspective." Even in those days of 1792 the Hugli was noted for its dangerous sands and shoals. Our voyager landed near the old dismantled fort which in 1756 had witnessed the tragedy of the Black Hole. In a corner of Tank Square, as it was then called, still stood, "in a ruinous and neglected state," the obelisk which Holwell, one of the few survivors, erected to the memory of those who perished in that night of untold horror. Young Twining managed to decipher the "almost obliterated inscription." The monument was taken down in 1821, for what reason even the researchful Dr. Busteed has failed to ascertain. The very site of the fatal cell or guard-room known as the Black Hole had long been matter for conjecture before the excavations made in 1833.

In Calcutta our author often dined with Lord Cornwallis, of whom he speaks with just admiration; and in 1794 he deplores the loss of one of his "kindest friends," Sir William Jones, who died that year of liver complaint at the early age of forty-eight. One day after dinner Sir William startled his young friend by calling loudly for "Othello." In answer to the call appeared "a black turtle of very large size, crawling slowly towards us from an adjoining room."

From Santipore, then famed for its muslin manufactures, Twining, in July, 1794, began his voyage in a "budgerow" up the Ganges towards Oudh, in company with the flotilla that conveyed the new commander-in-chief,

Sir Robert Abercromby, and his staff. The record of daily progress, nightly halts, and incidents by the way carries the reader past many places of old or modern renown. At Benares we come upon Mr. Duncan preparing to quit that city for the post of Governor at Bombay. At Allahabad our traveller discusses the long-vaied question as to the identity of that place with the city known to the Greeks as Palibothra. He seems on the whole to have been led by his subsequent researches to the conclusion, since endorsed by General Cunningham, that Patna, whose ancient name was Pataliputra, must have been the city to which Arrian referred.

At Dalmow, above Fatehpur, young Twining had his first ride upon an elephant, and "sat like a nabob in the middle of a splendid howdah, or pavilion spacious enough to hold several persons. We went along at a rate that astonished me." It belonged to the Nawab-Wazir of Oudh, who had come down with a brilliant retinue to exchange greetings with the general and his party. The latter were handsomely entertained for several days before resuming their voyage to the frontier station of Fatehgarh. On the way up, Twining saw with interest the remains of that ancient city Canouj, which 1000 years B.C. is said to have contained 30,000 shops for the sale of betel alone.

The pleasant voyage of two months and nineteen days had now come to an end in the beginning of October. Sir R. Abercromby soon afterwards crossed the Ganges with a body of troops to aid the Nawab-Wazir in suppressing the revolt of a Rohilla chief. We may notice by the way that some thousands of these Rohillas whom, according to Mill and Macaulay, Warren Hastings had "exterminated" in 1774, now came near to snatching a victory from Abercromby's Sepoys. The particulars of the fight, as given by Twining, will probably be new to many readers of Indian history.

Twining's journey from Fatehgarh to Agra and Delhi forms the most interesting part of the book. The road he took lay through a country desolated by years of warfare and anarchy, and preyed upon by roving bands of Gujars, Mewatties, and Pindaris, who stormed villages, plundered caravans, and robbed the poorest traveller of his blanket and a few piecs. Twining himself fell in with more than one of these robber gangs, but the strength of his escort, his plan of marching by night, and his careful avoidance of dangerous places saved him from all mishaps. At Agra he pitched his tent for some days in the gardens of the Taj Mahal, feasting his eyes with the dreamlike beauty of Shah Jahan's noble monument to his beloved wife, roaming through the marble mosques, courts, and chambers of Akbar's fortress, exploring the city, and riding out to view the architectural glories of Sikandra and Fatehpur Sikri. His friend and fellow traveller, Padre Juvenal, took him over his own little church, which had been erected in the time of Akbar, and had suffered no harm from the jealous bigotry of Aurangzeb.

Furnished with an escort of matchlockmen and bowmen by the Maratha Governor of Agra, Twining marched on towards Delhi, where the blind Shah Alam still held his court by sufferance of his Maratha allies and patrons. Every man Twining met along the road was armed. The very peasants working in the fields around their villages carried arms or had them ready for use by their side. It must be allowed that things have changed notably for the better since the Doib exchanged the rule of a Sindhia for that of Wellesley and Lord Hastings. On November 29th Twining made his last march to Delhi, over a road lined on both sides with ruins of older Delhi stretching as far as he could see. "Houses, palaces, tombs, in different stages of dilapidation, composed this striking scene. The desert we had passed was cheerful compared with the desolation now before us." The noble tomb of Humayun claimed and received his special notice. Thanks to his own credentials and the courtesy of the Governor of Delhi, the traveller secured a pleasant lodging for himself in a garden-house within the city.

The desire of his heart was soon gratified by his admission to an audience of the poor old emperor, who twenty-five years before had been the pensioned guest of the East India Company, in return for his acknowledgment of British sovereignty over Bengal. The account of the ceremony fills several pages. According to the custom, we suppose, of that day, Twining went forth "dressed in white and enveloped in a very long orange-coloured shawl," with his feet shod in gold-embroidered sandals, curling back over the toes "like a Dutch skate." On approaching the presence, after taking off his sandals, he made slowly three low salaams, his right hand almost touching the carpet before he raised it to his forehead. In spite of his seventy-one years, the Great Mogul "looked the tallest and stoutest of all present," and the loss of sight was indicated only by "a depression of the eyelids." In return for the letter he bore from Sir R. Abercromby and for his offering of a few gold mohurs, Twining was invested with the usual kilt or robe of honour. After an exchange of compliments with the Padshah, he repeated his obeisances and retired backwards through the two lines of attendants, to roam at leisure among the buildings and grounds of the Shah-Bagh.

On his journey back to Santipore he passed some pleasant days at Koil, the modern Aligarh, as a guest of General de Boigne, who a twelvemonth later resigned his command in the service of Daulat Rao Sindhia, leaving behind him a name not less honoured by our countrymen than by his own. His splendid bodyguard of native horse was afterwards taken into the service of John Company. De Boigne spoke to his young friend "with much gratitude of the assistance and protection" which Warren Hastings had once afforded him, when he purposed taking Northern India on his way back to Franco-overland. That journey, as we know, was to be cut short by the agency of Madhaji Sindhia.

On Twining's further adventures there is no need to dwell. Passing through Lucknow and Faizabad, he reached Santipore again on the last day of February, 1795, after an absence of seven months and a half. In November of the same year he left Bengal for England, taking America on his way. The account of his voyage to Philadelphia, then the capital of the young United States; of his intercourse with such men as Washington, Adams, M. Volney, and Dr. Priestley; of his visit to Baltimore, Alexandria, and Washington; of the country he passed through and the people he met, contains some of the pleasantest and most instructive reading in the whole book. Among the "detached narratives" we may note a simply touching description of a suttee at which Twining was present. His style, clear, scholarly, and elegant, seems to harmonize with the portrait in the frontispiece, and with the close of the "periwig" period in our ordinary dress. As a record of Indian travel his book deserves a place beside the corresponding works of Bernier and Tavernier.

Life and Letters of Thomas Pelham Dale. By his Daughter, H. Pelham Dale. 2 vols. (George Allen.)

NOVELTY cannot fail to charm a considerable section of readers, and the publisher of the life of the Rev. Pelham Dale may fairly claim to have made a new departure. Clerical biographies are, for the most part, bound in those sad-coloured hues which are considered appropriate to the solemnity of the ecclesiastical profession. They rarely indulge in the luxury of margins, but emulate, in their abnegation of white, the severity of the Roman collar and the priest's coat. Illustrations are allowed, but on a meagre scale, and, as a rule, portraits only are permitted. In the 'Life' now before us all these customary conventionalities are disregarded. The binding is bright blue; the margin preponderates over the print; the illustrations are numerous, and several are even coloured! When æstheticism is making such large changes in our services, it is time that the same artistic sense should have something to say in the appearance of the biographies of distinguished Ritualistic clergymen.

The book begins with a sketch of the family history, and with a brief biography of Pelham Dale's father, the late Dean of Rochester, who was for many years a canon of St. Paul's and a conspicuous London clergyman of pronounced Evangelical views. This preliminary sketch of the family and of Dean Dale is, in our opinion, the most interesting portion of these two volumes.

William Dale, the father of the future Dean, was a bohemian, in whom, if we may believe in heredity, the cattle-lifting propensities of his Border-riding ancestors took the shape of a light regard for domestic responsibilities. He disappeared about 1790, leaving his four children to the care of their grandmother. Two charming pastel portraits of Thomas, afterwards Dean, Dale and his sister Anne adorn the pages of the 'Life.' Some aunts of the children on their father's side, who lived at Newcastle, were friends of John Wesley. Several of the great revivalist's letters to Miss Peggy Dale are printed in the volume. They show the affectionate nature of Wesley, but they are not favourable specimens of his spiritual insight. They begin in formal style with "Dear Madam" or "My dear Miss Peggy"; but before the correspondence ended with Miss Dale's death, they drift into "My dear Peggy." Here is one which was written in August, 1765:—

MY DEAR PEGGY,—I thought it was hardly possible for me to love you better than I did before I came last to Newcastle. But your artless, simple, undisguised Affection, exceedingly increased mine. At the same time it increased my Confidence in you, so that I feel you are unspeakably near & dear to me. O what a Cordial is this, which is given to quicken us in our way! Surely

An Earnest of our great Reward
On Earth our Master pays!

We have all reason, to give ourselves up to Him without reserve, & to glorify Him with our Bodies and with our Spirits!

If you cleave to Him with simplicity of heart, certainly you need not feel Sin any more. Indeed you will feel Temptations of various kinds & sometimes closing you in on every side. But still your soul may stand fast, believing in the Lord. By Faith you will overcome—All! 'Believe, while saved from sin's remains! Believe yourself to Heaven.' I am, my dear Peggy, your Affectionate Brother

J. WESLEY.

Don't forget what you have learnt in Music.

Thomas Dale was brought up by his grandmother, Mrs. Smith, who sent him first to Christ's Hospital, and then to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. At twenty-one he married a girl of seventeen, took orders, and supported himself in comfort by his pen and his pupils. Later on he was made Professor of English Language and Literature at London University, afterwards University College. Besides being an excellent scholar, he possessed a gift of verse-writing, and many of his lines were printed in the silk-bound annuals of the day. Among his pupils were Alexander Forbes, afterwards Bishop of Brechin, and John Ruskin, whose letters to his tutor from abroad have been recently published. His reputation as a preacher was deservedly great, and at the livings which he successively held of St. Bride's and St. Pancras, as well as at St. Paul's, he attracted large congregations.

His eldest son was the Rev. Thomas Pelham Dale. Pelham Dale became, in after years, an excellent Hebrew and classical scholar; but as a child and young man he was before everything else a mathematician. His tutor at Cambridge was Colenso, who was so struck with his ability that he said to his pupil, "You ought to write a treatise on the Romance of the Differential Calculus!" He was elected to a Fellowship at Sidney, but shortly afterwards vacated it on his marriage. He was ordained in 1846, and began his clerical career as a strong Evangelical. As soon as he had taken priests' orders he was appointed to the living of St. Vedast, alias Foster, with St. Michael-le-Querne, near the General Post Office. The living was in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, and the young rector lived with his father, who was then a canon of the Cathedral.

One of the Canon's servants at Amon Court was afterwards made a verger. He was at first refused as too short. But he assured Canon Dale that he could gain the necessary height

"by thick but light shoes to raise him half-an-inch, and 'to have hair on my head by means of a Scalp which would give me at least one and a half, if not more, which would bring me to the height which you said would do.' Such pleading could not be resisted; he obtained the appointment, and, as verger, escorted some of the Royal Family up to the Cross of St. Paul's. One of the princesses leaned on his arm in the descent, and he went about for some time after, proclaiming, like a happy ogre, 'I have touched Royal flesh!'

At St. Vedast's Pelham Dale made work to do. He originated a woman's union for parochial visiting, and he collected a congregation in a building which had before been empty of worshippers. He was one of the first clergymen who opened a City church for half-hour services in the middle of the day. The choir of St. Lawrence Jewry migrated to St. Vedast's after the promotion of Dr. Cowie to the Deanery of Manchester, and thus Dale was enabled to make his services "bright and cheerful." He had taught himself to regard a development of ritual as the necessary outcome of the Evangelical revival, and in 1876 a prosecution was commenced against him by the Church Association under the Public Worship Act. Possibly the Association selected him the more gladly for attack as he was originally an Evangelical, and was the son of one of their most eminent preachers. The complaint on which the proceedings were instituted was laid by the churchwardens, who had been long engaged in a bitter dispute with the rector respecting their administration of a valuable charity trust. Among other items in their expenditure to which he objected was the thirty pounds which were annually spent in an audit dinner. Later on this charity fund was made to bear the burden of prosecuting Mr. Dale! Whatever may have been the motives at work in the prosecution, legal proceedings are not exactly consistent with charitable objects.

For several years Dale fought the battle in which he doubtless believed he was right. At all events, he suffered severely for conscience' sake, and his motives, whatever opinion may be entertained of the occasion or of the wisdom of his conduct, are entitled to respect. Into the long history of litigation which centred round his name it is not our intention to enter, though to it is devoted the greater part of this biography, and on it depends the chief claim of Dale to such posthumous honours. Probably, although the legal victory was won by the Church Association, most people agree that the fruits of victory rest with the men who, like Dale or Green, went to prison.

In 1881 Dale was offered by a private patron the living of Sausthorpe in the diocese of Lincoln, Christopher Wordsworth, the bishop, having previously told the patron that he would "gladly welcome Mr. Dale to a peaceful resting-place after his present troubles." For the next eleven years of his life Dale held the living, and there he died in 1892.

The family of Pelham Dale doubtless believe that his life was shortened and, for a time, embittered by the prosecution of which he was the object. It is, therefore, difficult to avoid sympathy with his daughter in the effort that she has made to vindicate her father's memory. But she would have succeeded better if she had published one volume instead of two, and if she had shortened the history of legal proceedings which involved no new principles, and are devoid of general interest.

A MEDIEVAL PARLIAMENT.

Memoranda de Parlamento, 1305. By F. W. Maitland. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

It is pretty generally known that the Master of the Rolls' series of "Chronicles and Memorials" has not, of late years, enjoyed the favour of the authorities. Nor is it possible to deny that its volumes are of unequal merit and value. To Mr. Maxwell Lyte is due, we believe, the resuscitation of the series in a somewhat new form by the publication of the volume before us. For it he has a virtual precedent in Mr. Hubert Hall's edition of the Red Book of the Exchequer, to which historical students had long been looking forward.

For Prof. Maitland's services there is always a keen competition. To him the Selden Society is practically indebted for its start, while the Pipe Roll Society lately entrusted him with the Rolls of the King's Court under Richard I. His inclusion among the Rolls editors is a matter for unqualified satisfaction, and the present volume will increase his already high reputation. An introduction of nearly a hundred pages, written in Mr. Maitland's luminous and singularly readable style, teems with information about his subject. We have first the adventurous wanderings of this "stray Parliament Roll," unknown even to Palgrave in 1827, and escaping the glue-pot only to linger in "a mass of putrid filth." Discovered at length by Hunter some half a century ago, it was produced in evidence before the Committee for Privileges in 1855. With the exception of its three Scottish membranes, the editor has proved that it is the roll of the Lenten Parliament, 1305. The Scottish membranes, he believes, include the autumn Parliament of that year. Nearly perfect, and of unusual length, such a roll certainly deserved printing as a record of "the first age of parliamentary history."

To illustrate this Roll by the "Ancient Petitions," of which the originals are still preserved, is the task the editor has set before himself. As a preliminary he had to try to identify five hundred petitions among sixteen thousand of these undated documents! And it is to be feared that even this number represents only the portion that has survived. The process of dealing with them is thus described:—

"First we have the original petition in homely French, then the brief entry on the Parliament Roll, then the writ which tells the story yet once more, and this time in the grandiose 'chancery style,' with proper flourishes about the king's 'special grace' and his desire to do justice to all his subjects."

The five hundred "petitions" were disposed of in a session of three weeks by an essentially "full parliament"; but the king and his Council, acting as a parliament, remained in session some time longer. What then, the editor asks, was the composition of this Council?

The question is by no means easy. One portion of it—for us the most interesting—was summoned in right of its membership alone. This represented the official class, "almost all that England has to show in the way of legal learning, official experience, and administrative ability." Thirty-three names are thus accounted for. For the others the editor pursues a plan that he had already suggested in the English Historical Review: he examines the lists of witnesses to the royal charters of the time, in order to ascertain the king's entourage. From the Parliament Roll itself he recovers other names. Eventually he decides that the Council—for he sees but one—was "in the main a body of officers, of ministers, of men who, in one capacity or another, are doing the king's work and receiving the king's pay." In one sense it presented that strong executive which the United States have found their safeguard against democracy; in another, it is something between our own Privy Council and the ideal of some theorists for a House of Lords.

Into the subject of audience of petitions, the chief business of the Parliament, Mr. Maitland goes closely. What may be termed the principle of devolution seems to have been early applied. "Auditors" were appointed to receive these petitions, and sort them into classes for separate treatment. We have accordingly a "strong committee for Gascon affairs," including several men of Southern birth. Another committee dealt with petitions from Ireland and the Channel Islands, and another with those from Scotland. It is uncertain how the English ones were dealt with.

Prof. Maitland has some shrewd remarks on the fact that these petitions were presented in, but not to, Parliament. They were at this time addressed to the king or to the king in Council, for a parliament, as he reminds us, then meant a colloquy rather than a body of persons. The word has undergone a change. It was not so much legislation as justice or an act of grace that these petitions sought. And there was much "of what an impatient reader may call circumlocution and red tape" to face, even in those days, before either could be obtained. The petition was but the first step towards "moving" the Chancery or the Exchequer. Nor could even that step be taken without running the gauntlet of official inquiry. The alleged facts were first inquired into by the experienced "triers," who could reject the petition, as a grand jury in these days can throw out a bill. But with the petitions of individuals, or even of communities—constituencies, we should now say—were mixed up in inextricable confusion those of the assembled lords and commons. As to the action of the commons, apart from their corporate petitions, Mr. Maitland leans to the view that they were frequently consulted as individuals as to the grievances and interests of their several constituencies; that, in short, through them the king in Council was keeping in touch with the nation at large.

The jurisdictional competence of the king's Council and its relation to the House of Lords, then in course of formation, are subjects on which this Parliament throws some light. Mr. Maitland sees under Edward I. a new tribunal in process of evolution, a court "above the King's Bench," and yet, at first, hardly distinct from it. Bracton knows only the Court of King's Bench; 'Fleta' already differentiates that court from that highest tribunal in the realm which will eventually become "the high court of Parliament." But as yet the growth is new, the position is uncertain.

This nascent supreme court, moulded doubtless by our English Justinian, was clearly the king in Council, but was it also the king in Parliament? What share in it had the House of Lords? The editor states the conditions of the problem; but he declines to decide it. Yet we see in him, if he will pardon us for saying so, the historian struggling with the lawyer, and the historian is the stronger. He does not envisage such questions as these through the logical spectacles of a later age. He knows, for instance, that the House of Lords was not made, but grew into being, and he reads the documents of Edward's reign in the light of that age, and not of another one; indeed, he is so at home in his period that he knows his men as if he had met them. Take, for instance, this slight sketch of the Earl of Norfolk, Marshal of England:—

"He has been in disgrace. Three years ago he had to surrender his estate and office to the king, and take them back on terms which will make him the last of his great race. There is no quarrel now. On the 14th of March the king 'because of his great affection'—so runs the chancery formula—forgives him the debts that he owes. He may well be an old, disappointed, broken man; death is at hand, and the days of the Bigods are over."

So, too, we have a touch of mediæval life:—

"In and about Oxford Castle there had been a serious riot, in which some clerks of the university had taken their full and accustomed share."

The writer is a learned professor, but he is also a Cambridge man.

The editing of the Roll and the "apparatus" of the volume are both as perfect as we might expect from the hand that gave us 'Bracton's Note-Book.' Without indulging in German diffuseness, Mr. Maitland has compiled appendices of over sixty pages, all useful and to the point. We presume that he has verified the printed names of the barons summoned, though one might not at first in "John de Graystock" recognize the Baron of Greystock. In conclusion, we would hope that the responsible authorities may persevere with the task they have begun, and publish many further volumes as welcome to the historian as this.

Sixty Years' Experience of an Irish Landlord: Memoirs of John Hamilton, D.L., St. Ernan's, Donegal. Edited by the Rev. H. C. White. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Irish landlordism is too often regarded as a synonym for oppression, rack-renting, and robbery, but this volume relates the life of an Irish landlord who was idolized by his tenants, who spent on his property more than he received from it, and embarrassed himself and his family by the injudicious expenditure of capital as well as income in providing employment and food during the famine years. Yet such instances were by no means uncommon amongst a much abused class. Mr. Hamilton's benevolence produced, as was natural, reciprocal good feeling:—

"In 1826 he removed to St. Ernan's, and in the following year resolved to connect the Isle of St. Ernan's with the mainland by a causeway one furlong in length. He engaged a body of regular labourers to do the work. This project excited great enthusiasm in the neighbourhood and a general resolution to lend a helping hand. The peasantry for ten miles round (not Mr. Hamilton's own tenantry only) came in bodies of from fifty to one hundred men, did the work heartily and refused payment in money or food for their work."

"One morning in July a loud drumming told me of the arrival of a strong party from a village six miles off. They were the members of a Yeomanry Corps, and all Orangemen, fine stout fellows, but hot-blooded. They had hardly arrived when a fiddle and fife proclaimed another arrival, and I was a little dismayed when I found about an equal force on the ground from a mountainous property about seven miles off in an opposite direction, every man of them not only Roman Catholic but exactly of that class and character most opposite to my Orange friends. In fact it was more than supposed that most of them were Ribbonmen, and their district had a very bad name for either loyalty or peaceableness."

The only contest, however, was who should work the hardest, and the rest of the day was spent in good-humoured chaff and rival cheers.

Mr. Hamilton's position was indeed difficult, for he was the possessor of 20,000 acres of wild land in a remote district, inhabited by a poor tenantry. Still, by dint of personal superintendence and active benevolence, he effected much good for every one but himself, and evinced foresight in recommending the conversion of leasehold into freehold tenures long before the idea was embodied in the Bright clauses or in the Ashbourne Act. The most marked feature in his character was his fervent and enthusiastic adoption of Evangelical tenets. Strange to say, his Protestantism did not embroil him with his Roman Catholic neighbours. To the very last, even to the end of the "land war," we find him the subject of praise from the clergy of that Church, who include with him many of the leading landowners in the vicinity. "In all Ireland," writes Father Doherty, his parish priest,

"there never was, nor is there, a more considerate and humane landlord than the good and kind-hearted proprietor of St. Ernan's. I know the pulse of his tenants well, and I know of my own knowledge that they honour him, respect him, and love him for his personal kindness and friendliness towards them, and for his sympathy with them in all their worldly fortunes and mishaps. They regard him more in the light of a friend and benefactor, like his Master 'going about doing good,' than as a landlord."

Connected as Mr. Hamilton was with the highest aristocracy of Ireland, the Wellesleys, Pakenhams, and others, and in constant correspondence with viceroys and other important officials, it is not surprising that these pages should contain much interesting correspondence and several amusing anecdotes. The following will give an impression of the "Iron Duke" different from that generally entertained. One evening, at the Chief Secretary's Lodge, Phoenix Park,

"a curious circumstance occurred, considering who one of the persons concerned came afterwards to be. Sir Arthur and my uncle Henry Pakenham (afterwards Dean of St. Patrick's) took my brother and me out to walk— evening came on—dinner-time drew near, and the boys were weakly and could not run fast, so Sir Arthur took me on his back, and my uncle Henry took Edward and set off running. Soon it became a race. I was a good deal the heavier, and my uncle Henry, then about twenty-two, was very active and left us far behind for the first couple of hundred yards. But Sir Arthur had bottom and began to regain his lost ground, and at last came up close to his antagonist, shouting, and both put out their utmost speed and both shouted with all their lungs. The gate was to be the winning post, and with a wild Hallelu! Sir Arthur passed to the front and won by a few yards, but in half a minute was a prisoner in the custody of the guard mounted at the gate, and who in the dusk did not perceive who the disturbers of the peace were."

Even in these days of competitive examination, the opinion of so great a soldier on the subject of military training may carry weight:—

"If you are worth your salt you will learn soldiering when you get your commission, and at Cambridge you will get that education both of learning and of habit, which you can never get again. Besides you will have the advantage which a man must always lose who is brought up with a view to a particular profession, the advantage of a free standing point untrammelled by the ingrained prejudices that take root in the finest minds which are kept in one circle. You can afford the money and the time for two educations, avail yourself of these advantages, be educated first, as if for the pulpit or the bar, and then you will have a double chance of making a first-rate soldier. I would give more than I can mention," added the Duke, "that I had had a university education."

Seers and Singers: a Study of Five English Poets. By Arthur D. Innes. (Innes & Co.)

THE five English poets of whom Mr. Innes treats are Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Mrs. Browning, and Matthew Arnold; and he is chiefly concerned with Tennyson and Browning. Mrs. Browning scarcely comes into the scope of the volume at all, and Matthew Arnold is rarely introduced except to point a comparison, generally to his disadvantage. To Wordsworth a certain amount of space is devoted, though it cannot be asserted that any particular felicity is shown in the handling of a subject on which everything seems to have been said already. Mr. Innes explains at the outset his point of view and the manner of his criticism:—

"I may as well begin, therefore, by humbly acknowledging that no one need look for scientific criticism from me, because they [sic] will only find personal impressions. And that must be my excuse if the impertinent third vowel seems to crop up with undue frequency. Personal impressions have no business to be put forward with the dogmatic assertiveness of impersonal statements. Further, I had better apologise at once for any digressions I may make from the nominal subjects of the following chapters—they are merely labelled for the sake of general convenience."

Such a "leisurely discussion about a group of poets who are in various ways associated in" Mr. Innes's "own mind" cannot be said to appeal to the mind of the reader, whose only knowledge of Mr. Innes is derived from the rather confused paragraph in which his views of criticism are set forth. In the first place Mr. Innes ought to be aware that there is not, never was, and never can be, such a thing as "scientific criticism" of literature; that criticism is and must be a record of personal impressions, but of personal impressions which have been directed and assisted by various kinds of training—educated, in short, to such a point that they may be relied upon, to a greater or less extent, in the judging of any new work of art which is brought before their notice. To define criticism by such an epithet as "scientific" is to confuse the characteristics of hard fact, which science is an attempt to search into and classify, with the characteristics of that floating and variable world of idea, sentiment, and sensation of which literature is the expression, and with which criticism has to do. Certain laws there may indeed be said to be in the criticism of literature, certain traditions which retain the sanction of the centuries, certain first principles, which, at all events, have never been satisfactorily contradicted. An acquaintance with all this, an acceptance of the inevitable, in despite of the petulance of new dogmas, the intolerance of new beliefs, is essential to the critic; without it he can be no more than a coloured rag in the wind; yet with it, and with no more than this, he may be no more than a wooden signpost. In a sense it may even be said that all that the best critic really tells us—beyond the discussion, which may be of much practical value, of purely technical points in the composition of verse and prose—is that he likes one book for such and such reasons (the reasons being mainly an attempt to explain to himself why he has been instinctively attracted), and that he dislikes another book for such and such further reasons. If the critic be a man of great natural intelligence, his knowledge of good and evil increased and controlled by wide reading and careful thought, then such an opinion, given thus freely and spontaneously, is of the greatest possible value. But, on the other hand, merely to know the opinion of a person who shows no sign of exceptional intelligence or culture is as absolutely uninteresting, unimportant, and a waste of time as it is for such a person, who might be better employed, to write down his opinions. That is a point which Mr. Innes scarcely seems to have grasped.

Let us admit, however, that this book of his, though written with a carelessness which is frequently annoying, has, of its kind, plenty of common-sense remarks on various subjects. Here is one of the most sensible of them:—

"But now let us examine this trouble of 'Brownings' a little more closely; for it appears to me that the defect is one which has been gravely exaggerated, and that some of the poet's most devoted admirers are in no small degree responsible. If you really cannot be expected to appreciate Browning without the illumination of lectures from a society; and if, when your society is dissolved, you can't get along without a cyclopaedia specially designed to make him intelligible; if, after years of reading, you need all this—why, clearly you can hardly complain if people say that Browning may be very fine, but the game isn't worth the candle. The truth is, that all this paraphernalia of interpretation, useful as it may be for specific purposes and in specific cases, tends greatly to force into prominence whatever is obscure and difficult in the poet's work; to make one tackle him in the spirit which should be reserved for studying the Secret of Hegel or a corrupt chorus in Æschylus; to thrust into the background the simple fact that, outside of one or two of the early poems and a few late ones, most of Browning is plain sailing enough, or made difficult mainly by the unexpected character of an idea—and an unexpected idea is always difficult to grasp at first sight—the suddenness with which a fresh point of view is caught, or the depth of the thought presented."

That, surely, is exceedingly sensible, though everything in the book is not equally so; but why should observations of this kind, even when they are sensible observations, be printed as criticism, and given us to read in a book? There may be a reason, but we fail to see it.

NEW NOVELS.

In Direst Peril. By David Christie Murray. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. MURRAY has invaded a new domain of fiction—new, at any rate, for him, although the combination of historical episodes with a drama of personal adventure, excitement, and romance has of late years come much into fashion again with some of our best novelists and with the generality of novel-readers. 'In Direst Peril' is a fresh picture painted on the lurid background of Austrian domination in Italy, and the characters are English, Austrian, and Italian, including spies and traitors of the three nationalities—some of them, it must be admitted, less natural and lifelike than the others. The conceptions, however, are none of them impossible, and when Mr. Murray once conceives his characters he may be trusted to work them out consistently. The hero, who tells his own story, begins by falling in love with the half-English daughter of an Italian count who has for twenty years been mowed in an Austrian fortress. He rescues the prisoner, and after a while assists him in striking a blow for Italian freedom, being entangled all the time in a network of plot and counterplot on English soil. There is no need to pause and consider the precise degree of probability in the adventures of John Fyffe, Count Rossano and his daughter, the Honourable (and dishonourable) George Brunow, and the other patriots and spies who throng the pages of Mr. Murray's novel. The main question is whether he has made a good and engrossing novel out of his materials; and this question may be answered decidedly in the affirmative. Without drawing comparisons between this story and sundry adventurous narratives which have recently hit the public taste in a somewhat exceptional manner, it is only fair to treat the author of 'Joseph's Coat' as a new hand in this particular branch of fiction, and to say that he has taken to it with considerable vigour and success.

A Marriage Ceremony. By Ada Cambridge. 2 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)

It is a pleasure to read this novel by Miss Cambridge, if for nothing else because she shows therein considerable mastery of the novelist's craft in being able to arrange and tell a simple story simply and effectively. The work is, perhaps, rather thin, but it has no pretensions of revealing the subtleties of human nature any further than in describing the wayward petulance of a woman who is too proud to acknowledge that she shares the love that is offered by her wooer, which, though an old story, is charmingly told by this author. The efforts of the husband to gain the affections of the wife to whom he was prematurely married are told with spirit and humour, and we hardly pity the husband for his uncomfortable three nights in the garden within sight of his wife's house, since he was in the end so amply rewarded. The only point in which the book requires some modification is in the incident of Hilda, of which rather too much is made; while the amorous transports of Rutherford and Betty before Hilda's corpse had left the house, though perhaps natural under the circumstances, are distinctly jarring to a sense of good taste. It may be mentioned that the plot is laid chiefly in Australia, and that the account of the distress and panic caused by the recent bank failures, though not obtrusively brought in, is graphic and interesting.

Baptist Lake. By John Davidson. (Ward & Downey.)

To describe a book like Mr. John Davidson's 'Baptist Lake' by the aid of one inevitable and adequate word is more than usually hard. It is not so much that it is put together incoherently, yet artistically—if that be not a contradiction in terms—but that it is compounded of most various and often incongruous elements. Were it a fantasy, a pure extravaganza, a satire, a story of emotion, sentiment, or incident, an idyl, or even a study in realism, it might be more easily hit off; but partaking, as it does, a little of all these and something besides, instantaneous definition is not easy. Two things seem certain: it is a book to read, and the principal character, if not a direct caricature of a well-known personage, is meant to resume—in his sayings and doings, his carefully trained hyper-sensitiveness to impressions, and his mannered, overwrought speech, abounding in epigram and paradox—a pretty close and clever presentment of a small group of the youth of this period. Some queer folk and strange scenes are introduced with much effect. Saturday night in Pilgrim Street and Baptist's adventures there perhaps show the author's method at its best. The Inglis family is in some respects the oddest and most incongruous part of the business. Still less in keeping with the general air and tone of the book are the smuggling adventures, in which a quaint and pleasant youth, aged fifteen, with serious intentions about matrimony, takes his part. Mrs. McAlister, the old Scotchwoman given to snuff and denunciation, is one of whom we should have liked to see and hear more. Mrs. Tiplady, the publican, and the barmaid Florrie are not a tenth part so entertaining or convincing, and they rather go against the grain besides.

Victims. By F. W. Maude. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

MR. MAUDE has undertaken a hard task: he has chosen to write about divorce and adultery, a dipsomaniac and the casuistry relating to his rights over a pure-minded wife who married him in ignorance, the improper use of hypnotic suggestion, and many other potentially scabrous topics; but on the whole he has steered clear of his difficulties, and has produced a good story and strong characters, and all without appearing to shock Mrs. Grundy for the pure pleasure of so doing. He has avoided the extremes of the "rose-pink" and the "dirty drab," and, as far as in him lay, has given us the rose "with the stem, the thorns, the roots, and the fat bedding of roses." For this attempt he deserves infinite credit, and hardly less for remembering that a novel is not a sermon or a social tract, as his subject might have tempted him to forget. In Gladys, the chief victim of the story, he has created a striking type of woman, one whose almost overmastering love is kept in check by a still stronger sense of duty; and however much one may realize the folly, almost amounting to stupidity, in her first act of self-sacrifice—her marriage with Morton—it is possible still to understand and even to sympathize with her. Her lover Musgrave's sudden change from cynicism to enthusiasm is less credible, still it is intelligible; but as a creation Morton is the most original and interesting character; the genuine piety of the man and his innate uprightness are touches of originality which add to the horror of the situation and make his weakness appear more terrible. The fault of the book is that it is far too long; there are long conversations and discussions which are tiresome to read, and do not add much to the action, and some even of the incidents which occur to the principals might conceivably be cut out or shortened with advantage to the crispness of the story; but this is a fault which may very possibly be due to youth in an author as yet ignorant of the effective use of the pruning-knife, and unwilling to clip his earlier efforts.

Foes in Ambush. By Capt. Charles King. (Lippincott.)

FRONTIER life in Arizona in the early seventies is the theme of Capt. King's vigorous narrative, and it may be frankly admitted that in the art of piling up the agony he is a past master. A brief epilogue excepted, the whole of his book is devoted to a single episode of a couple of days' duration, into which every conceivable kind of peril is condensed. But Capt. King has the happy knack of inspiring confidence in his ability to extricate his heroes and heroines from the appalling network of treachery into which they are beguiled. The reader soon realizes that virtue, as represented by gallant troopers and fair damsels, bears a charmed life, and that villainy, in the persons of Mexicans, Apaches, and deserters, is doomed in the long run to defeat and extinction. It only remains to add that the author evidently knows his country well, and is thus enabled to give his thrilling tale a thoroughly picturesque setting. As an antidote to the introspective or analytical novel, his story may be recommended.

A Bush Girl's Romance. By Hume Nisbet. (White & Co.)

THE interest in this tale is well sustained from beginning to end, and we can compliment Mr. Nisbet upon the ingenuity with which he has worked out an improbable, or we might say an impossible, plot. We are not partial to sensational accounts of bush-rangers and their atrocities, which are now ancient history, and which are in no way characteristic of Australia in general, and were never applicable to Western Australia, where the scene of this story is laid; and we must still more strongly protest against the habit of depicting any of that fraternity in the character of a hero, instead of that of an unmitigated ruffian; while surely it is unnecessary to add harrowing and revolting details offensive to good taste. We have had occasion in former notices to remark that our author produces stories in which there is no one character calculated to excite a genuine interest; and this observation is equally applicable to his present work.

POETRY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Poems Here at Home. By James Whitcomb Riley. (Longmans & Co.)

Poems. By Harriet McEwen Kimball. (New York, Randolph & Co.)

Seaward: an Elegy on the Death of Thomas William Parsons. By Richard Hovey. (Boston, U.S., D. Lothrop Company.)

Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley. By John James Piatt. New Edition. (Longmans & Co.)

Little New-World Idyls, and other Poems. (Same author and publishers.)

MR. RILEY, author of 'Poems Here at Home,' is no novice in verse, having published in the United States at least eight volumes—of which one had an English edition. This new volume is mostly in dialect: and American dialect is, as we all know, a piquant and saporific flavouring able, like that sauce which the gourmet declared could make a man eat his grandmother, to give relish to any sort of material. Mr. Riley, in common with many other writers in dialects, relies a little too much on the virtues of the dialect sauce, seeming at times to have allowed it to conceal from himself more than it does from his readers that what he is saying is in itself but trite and talkative, not worth the skill bestowed upon it. But oftentimes his skill in dialect and in humorous versification—skill which is very great—is used on matter which has true fun, or true shrewdness, or true pathos, and that pointedness under the grave disguise of accident and simple-mindedness which is a special cunning of American wit. A large proportion of the pieces in the volume—a fourth, indeed—are for infantine readers, and it is not all of those that possess quality to make them, as so often fun written for children is found to be, especially enjoyable to adults; but some of them do possess this gift—notably 'The Fishing Party' and 'The Bee-bag.' The children-pieces are all written in dialect modified by what are, no doubt, the pronunciations customary to young children speaking it, and few, if any, English children will understand them readily enough to take delight in them. There are among 'Poems Here at Home' several not in dialect. These are almost all touched, or more than touched, with sadness. They have considerable gracefulness and poetic feeling.

The poems of Miss Harriet McEwen Kimball, published in what is described on the title-page as a complete edition, deserve attention for their literary and poetic superiority to the general run of religious verse. Considering what magnificent poetry religious and devotional inspiration gave the Hebrew seers and psalmists, and gave also, in other forms, to the great poets of heathen antiquity, it is very remarkable (although on investigation not inapplicable) that the fervour of Christian adoration and faith, however genuine, seems seldom able to stimulate bardic exaltation, and that the verse of piety should usually be the least poetic of all verse of our times. But, remarkable as this may be, the fact of it has long been established past contradiction, and, while not forgetting a few bright instances of sacred poems in which there is true poetic influence, any reader of average education and taste who sees for the first time some new volume of religious verse opens it with the expectation, founded on many experiences, of meeting with a series of trite preachings and conventional laudations, a solemn jingle of inferior prose run into rhyme.

But Miss Kimball brings to her work a refined spirituality which goes far to take the place of that rare gift of actual poetic genius with which she can hardly be credited, and a delicate and well trained perception of fitness and of gracefulness; and of her productions several have literary beauty together with an eloquent impulsiveness becoming their hotly emotional themes, and none is beneath the fair average of a really skilled and sensitive writer. One poem, indeed, 'The Guest,' possesses a suggestiveness and mystic imagination which place it among true poetry in the strictest sense of the term. Miss Kimball has classed her poems in three parts, of which the first, covering considerably more than half the volume, is dedicated 'To my Mother, the holy Catholic Church,' and is solely religious; Part II., dedicated 'To my Nieces, Jeanie, Mary, and Edith,' has among its lyrics and sonnets several which are secular; Part III., dedicated 'To my God-children Jeannette Frances and Charles Emerson,' consists of eighteen little poems for children, and of these only a third are on sacred subjects. But both by the great numerical preponderance of the religious poems and by their more individual quality, it is as a writer of sacred poetry that Miss Kimball stands forth for consideration, and her secular poems, though they too show her excellent taste and her competence, will scarcely affect any estimate of her powers.

'Seaward,' by Mr. Richard Hovey, is an elegy on the death of Thomas William Parsons, an American poet not widely known in England. Mr. Hovey designates him — my elder brother in the Muse,

The poet of the Charles and Italy, and thus describes him:—

The hermit thrush of singers, few might draw
So near his ambush in the solitude
As to be witness of the holy awe
And passionate sweetness of his singing mood.
Not oft he sang, and then in ways apart,
Where foppish ignorance might not intrude
To mar the joy of his sufficing art.
Only for love of song he sang, untold
And unexpectant of responsive praise;
But they that loved and sought him where he hid,
Forbearing to profane his templed ways,
Went marvelling if that clear voice they heard
Flew thrilling through the bushes religious maze,
Were of a spirit singing or a bird.

There are several really touching stanzas and passages in this elegy; but as a whole it is spoiled by an apparent inability in its author to leave off when he has done. Several times the elegy is brought to what seems an ending, and then it inconsequently begins again. The conclusion at last is singularly inopportune. Mr. Hovey, having passed into a disquisition on the 'Vision of the Godhead' beheld by souls in Heaven,

Trine within trine, inaccessibly One, and on

— that great tranquil rapture they shall share!
That life compact of adamant and fire!

suddenly returns to what, because of their being "where the dead once loved to be," he started with—the marshes of Massachusetts Bay—returns to them with this stanza of good promise for a fine elegiac reminiscence to wind up with,

But still the marshes haunt me; still my thought Returns upon their silence, there to brood Till the significance of earth is brought Back to my heart, and in a sturdier mood
I turn my eyes toward the distance dim,
And in the purple far infinitude
Watch the white ships sink under the sea-rim; and then, with no word more of the departed poet, catalogues the ships' destinations thus:

Some bound for Flemish ports or Genoaese,
Some for Bermuda bound, or Baltimore;
Others, perchance, for further Orient seas,
Siam and the straits of Singapore,
Or antique cities of remote Cathay,
Or past Gibraltar and the Libyan shore,
Through Bab-el-mandeb eastward to Bombay;
And one shall signal flaming Teneriffe,
And the Great Captive's ocean-prison speak,
Then on beyond the demon-haunted cliff,
By Madagascar's palms and Mozambique,
Till in some sudden tropic dawn afar
The Sultan sees the colors at her peak Salute the minarets of Zanzibar.

And at Zanzibar the elegy has found its termination. Such a termination comes on the reader as a surprise, to say the least of it. To make 'Seaward' a good poem—which it really might be—Mr. Hovey would have, for one thing, to rearrange the sequence of the stanzas so as to give them a unity of connexion as parts of a whole, which is now too much wanting, and, for another thing, to omit many of them which are merely spasmodic and intrusive—such as, for a sample,

Playmate of terrors! Intimate of Doom:
Fellow of Fate and Death! Exultant Sea!
Thou strong companion of the Sun, make room!
Let me make one with you, rough comrade Sea!
Sea of the bolsters sport of wind and spray!
Sea of the lion mirth! Bonorous Sea!
I hear thy shout, I know what thou wouldst say.

As an elegy the poem needs more of its subject and less of its author.

'Idyls and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley,' by Mr. J. J. Piatt, is a new edition of a volume of verse which was noticed in the Athenæum so long ago as 1884. A new volume by the same author, 'Little New-World Idyls,' has qualities of goodly diction, expressive and truthful descriptiveness, and refined thoughtfulness, which gave value to the earlier one. Like the earlier one, it does not reveal any high poetic gift; but it offers much which deserves regard for its unaffectedly sweet and high-minded feeling and its artistic graciousness.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

SAMUEL BAMFORD wrote his Passages in the Life of a Radical about fifty-two years ago, and six years later this book was followed by his Early Days. The second volume is not so well known as the first, but it was better written, and is more likely to interest readers of to-day, and both are quite worthy of the place now assigned to them in the cheap and attractive "Reformer's Bookshelf" that Mr. Fisher Unwin is issuing. Bamford was born at Middleton, near Manchester, in 1788, and there and in the neighbourhood he was brought up as a weaver, and, before his association with the Peterloo Riots in 1819 led to his becoming a martyr in a small way, shared the hardships common to the English working classes in the early part of this century. He does not seem to have been a particularly steady workman. He took life too easily, and was fonder of rough pleasures than of his trade. In this, however, he was doubtless a fair representative of his class, differing only from his companions in having more brains and a livelier temperament than the average; and the straightforward account of his experiences and diversions until he settled down, more or less, to married life at the age of twenty-five, throws much light on the conditions of existence among the Lancashire operatives in the early stage of the cotton industry, and when Manchester and other towns now great were comparatively small. Mr. Henry Dunckley, who has judiciously edited these volumes, omitting some out-of-date passages and supplying a suggestive introduction, scarcely exaggerates when he speaks of 'Early Days' as "a delightful production, abounding in idyllic pictures and romantic adventures, and in passages of genuine pathos." It also chronicles a few scurrillages, dating from the day on which "the authorities and some of the ultra-loyal inhabitants of Manchester made their first grand political mistake" in calling on the townsmen to pass a congratulatory address to the Prince Regent. Greater disturbances followed as a result of the introduction of the Corn Bill in 1815; and though Bamford only occasionally took part in them, and was much less violent than many of his comrades, he paid heavily for his boldness. A prosecution for high treason in 1819, brought against him and eight others as well as Orator Hunt, fell through; but in 1820 he was imprisoned for a year on a charge of sedition. His adventures during the stormy times preceding this event and his gael experiences furnish material for his 'Passages in the Life of a Radical,' which is a valuable contribution to the history of the period, although its statements are not always trustworthy. "As a politician," Mr. Dunckley warns us, "Bamford is not to be taken too seriously. His politics were a part of his temperament, and varied with its changing moods. His character was essentially romantic, and he leaned to the sentimental side of everything." He sobered down after his release from prison, and, while anxious to make the most of his exploits and sufferings as a fighting Radical, ceased to admire those with whom he had shared them. It was altogether to his credit that he made for himself a respectable position as a journalist, an author, and even a "poet," but the change that had taken place both in his political views and in his social rank necessarily coloured his reminiscences of events more than twenty years old when he began to write about them.

THE ninth volume of the Speeches of Mr. Gladstone, edited by Mr. Hutton (the librarian of the National Liberal Club) and Mr. H. J. Cohen, and published by Messrs. Methuen & Co., is, we believe, the second of the series, which was begun with the tenth volume, and is, we presume, intended to be carried backwards till at length the first is reached. The present volume deals with the speeches of 1886 to 1888, and is mostly concerned with the Irish question in its various forms. There is, however, among the addresses here given the interesting discourse on the Queen's reign spoken at Hawarden, and a speech on the death duties, made in the House of Commons, in favour of the equalization of the charge upon real and personal property. The notes seem good as far as they go. The speeches are, with the exception of the Hawarden address to which we have referred, too strictly political for us to discuss them, and that Jubilee address is too well known and remembered for us to venture to describe it or to quote it.

LEADER SCOTT'S Echoes of Old Florence (Fisher Unwin) is uncommonly dry reading, but may be useful to persevering tourists.—Signor Bellezza's translation of Le Ultime Poesie di Alfredo Tennyson (Milan, Cogliati) is conscientious and occasionally felicitous, but to translate the heading of the lines addressed to Jowett "Al Direttore di Balliol" seems a little comic. It reminds one of the advertisements of schools in modern Italian newspapers.

THE Newspaper Press Directory of Messrs. Mitchell & Co. is always a welcome visitor. To the present issue Mr. Finlason contributes a couple of useful articles on the rights and liabilities of newspaper proprietors; and the list of the native journals in India has been enlarged.—The Railway and Commercial Gazetteer, Messrs. McCordale's useful publication, has reached a twelfth edition, as it deserved to do.

THERE has just appeared in Italy La Russia Contemporanea, by Signor Tommaso Carletti, published at Milan by Fratelli Treves—a careful study of the Russian Empire and its literature, in which, however, the reader will not find much with which he is not already familiar if he knows his Wallace, A. Leroy-Beaulieu, Tikhomirof, and Stepaniak. The only part of the volume in which we have remarked anything original is in the chapter on the Russian novelists, where there is an interesting discussion of the effect of other literatures on the Russian novel, and in turn of the Russian novel on the novel of other countries.

THE appreciative article on the late Bishop Lightfoot which appeared in the Quarterly has been reprinted by Messrs. Macmillan.

WE have received the Dryburgh editions of Quentin Durward and St. Ronan's Well (Black), the former illustrated by Mr. Paget, the latter by Mr. Thomson. Mr. Thomson's illustrations, although clever, are some of them a little disappointing. A note to 'St. Ronan's Well' gives the catastrophe as originally designed, reprinted from Mr. Collyer's communication in the Athenæum of February 4th, 1893.—The charming edition of Dumas's novels which Messrs. Dent & Co. issue has been enriched by two volumes, containing La Dame de Monsoreau.—Blanche, Lady Palaise, Mr. Shorthouse's tale (Macmillan & Co.), has reached yet another edition. Mrs. Steel's clever novel Miss Stuart's Legacy has been reissued in one neat volume by the same publishers.—Messrs. Routledge send us a pretty edition of Manon Lescaut, due to M. Guillaume, of Paris. Printing, illustrations, binding, and all are his, and very good they are. The translation seems to be Moylan's, although this is not stated.

WE have on our table Biographical Sketches of Bath Celebrities, by J. Murch (Pitman).—The Queen at Balmoral, by F. P. Humphrey (Fisher Unwin).—A Short Account of the Land Revenue and its Administration in British India, by B. H. Baden-Powell (Oxford, Clarendon Press).—Euripides, Bacchæ, edited by A. H. "THE NEW PLUTARCH."

Hampstead, Feb. 26, 1894.

I OBSERVE in Saturday's Athenæum a statement concerning a reissue by Marcus Ward & Co. of some of the volumes which formed part of the series called "The New Plutarch." I learn from this statement that the title of the series has been changed, and that the books are issued as if for the first time. It is quite true that Mr. Brodribb and myself were the editors of these biographies many years ago; it is not true that we have edited them for a new edition under another name for the year 1894. I have called the attention of the firm to this point, and if the matter is as your reviewer states, I have no doubt that it will be promptly set right.

The series appeared in the years 1879-1881. It had its run, and after some years it went the way of all series—that is to say, the demand decreased and ceased.

A few months ago my friend Mr. A. P. Watt suggested to me that, the demand for "The New Plutarch" having now practically ceased, it might be possible for me to recover possession of my two volumes and to place them in the hands of Messrs. Chatto & Windus, so as to bring, as much as possible, all my books into the same hands. This transfer was negotiated by him, accordingly, to the complete satisfaction, I believe, of all parties concerned. Messrs. Chatto & Windus have already brought out a new edition—the third—of my 'Coligny,' with the fact that it is a new edition duly recorded on the title-pages. I have nothing whatever to do with any reprint of the remaining volumes.

One other point is suggested by this little business. I observe that "An American Publisher," who, like Mr. Heinemann, is grievously tried and exercised by the existence of the literary agent, charges him with taking his authors, for the sake of a little temporary gain, from one publisher to another, thus scattering his works, to his great loss and detriment. Mr. Watt's action in this matter is exactly, your readers will perceive, in the opposite direction. He has been bringing my books together. The point, I repeat, is of very small importance. Only, one wonders where and who he is—this wicked agent who does such terrible things.

WALTER BESANT.

THE BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

As the insertion in your columns of Mr. Archer's letter may cause his article to be known, I hope you will allow me to state, as publicly, that its arguments will be duly disposed of, and its true character exposed. That exposed I shall not anticipate, but I think it will be found tolerably complete.

May I be allowed to add, as my reply has to wait for publication, that the curiously spiteful attack on me at the close of Miss Norgate's paper (an attack which has excited some comment in the press) will be shown to vary in its accuracy of fact inversely with the strength of its language?

When Mr. Archer publicly announced that "one of the most eminent of living English historians" had sent him "an absolute and full confutation" (details reserved) of my views, I thought me of that archer in the Bayeux Tapestry, "a small man without armour," as Mr. Freeman described him, "crouching under the shield of a tall housecarl, like Teukros under that of Aias"— αὐτὰρ ὁ αὖτις ἰὼν, πᾶσις ὡς ὑπὸ μητέρα, δύσκειν εἰς Ἀλαθ'. ὁ δὲ μιν σάκει κρήνησσε φαεινῇ.

But, it seems, I had mistaken the mysterious great one: it was not an Ajax who had come to the rescue; nor was it Teukros that my critic resembled, but Æneas, when the missile of Diomed had brought him to the ground:—

ἀμφὶ δ' ἰὼν φίλον υἱὸν ἐχέουστο πύγμα λευκῷ, πρόσθε δὲ οἱ πέπλοιο φαεινοῦ πύγμα κάλυψεν Ἴρκος ἔμην βελών, μή τις Δαναῶν ταχυπόδων χαλχὸν ἐνὶ στήθεσσι βαλὼν ἐκ θυμὸν ἔλοιτο.

Miss Norgate has come forward to extract Mr. Archer from a very difficult position, and I cannot but wish that her brilliant pen had been devoted to a happier cause.

Perhaps she may eventually be led to join in that wish herself. THE REVIEWER.

MR. MANNERS CHICHESTER.

THE sudden death last week of Mr. Henry Manners Chichester has deprived this country of a most ardent and accurate student of British military history. Born in London in 1832, the son of a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, Mr. Chichester entered the army in 1853, and became lieutenant in the 85th Regiment (the Shropshire Light Infantry). For ten years he served abroad with his regiment, chiefly at Mauritius and the Cape of Good Hope, and at the Cape he was employed for a time as acting engineer officer. Returning home in 1863, he retired from the army, and thenceforth devoted himself almost exclusively to the study of military history. He gave invaluable assistance in compiling and editing many volumes of regimental records. The published histories of the 24th Foot, the 40th Foot, and the 14th Foot—the last only issued six months ago—all owe much to Mr. Chichester's labours, and at the time of his death he was beginning work on the records of his own regiment, the 85th Foot. In 1890 he edited 'The Memoirs of the Extraordinary Military Career of John Shipp' in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Adventure Series."

But Mr. Chichester's most important contributions to literature appeared in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' To that work he was one of the largest contributors from the commencement. For it he wrote the memoirs of nearly five hundred military officers, and his name figures in the list of writers prefixed to each of the thirty-seven volumes already published. During the last ten years of his life he was indefatigable in his efforts to collect authentic biographic details for the 'Dictionary.' Among the more conspicuous military names entrusted to him were Lords Cadogan and Cutta, Viscount Hardinge of Lahore, Rowland, first Viscount Hill, Lord Lynedoch, Stringer Lawrence, and Sir John Moore. (The last article will be published in the volume now in the press.) Careful as were all Mr. Chichester's articles, it was in the memoirs of those officers whose achievements had previously attracted less attention than they deserved that he expended the greatest time and trouble. He ransacked manuscript material as readily as published books, and consulted, wherever possible, the official archives. On points of controversy he impartially considered all accessible evidence, and sought the truth with the utmost patience and energy. By way of illustrating his method of work, reference may be made to his account of Francis Jarry, a Frenchman by birth, who founded the Royal Military College, now located at Sandhurst. It was known that Jarry in earlier life had served at various times in both the Prussian and French armies; but in order to definitely ascertain his services abroad, Mr. Chichester applied to the ministries of war at both Paris and Berlin, and induced the authorities in both places to make investigation; the results appeared in his notice of Jarry in the 'Dictionary.'

All who value thoroughness in historical research and unselfish devotion to the study of history will deeply regret that Mr. Chichester's masterly contributions to the 'Dictionary' have been brought to so premature a close.

SALE.

MESSRS. SOOTHEY, WILKINSON & HODGE commenced the sale of the valuable stock of Mr. Toovey on Monday last. The sale is being well attended, and prices are ruling high. The following are some of the more important books that were sold in the first two days. A set of the Barbou Classics, in 68 vols., 1754-90, 18l. Boccaccio, Decameron, 5 vols., 1757, 15l. G. Borrow, Works, 15 vols., all first editions, 10l. 5s. Archæologia, Vols. THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MR. D. NUTT will publish shortly Vol. I. of 'The Traditional Games of England, Scotland, and Ireland,' collected and annotated by Mrs. Lawrence Gomme, forming the first section of a projected 'Dictionary of British Folk-lore'; Vol. II. is to be issued this year.—'The First Nine Books of the Danish History of Saxo-Græmmaticus,' translated by Mr. Oliver Elton, with some considerations on Saxo's sources, historical methods, and folk-lore, by Mr. York Powell (issued conjointly with the Folk-lore Society).—'Lyrics and Idylls of the Nile,' by Canon Rawnsley.—'Selected Sonnets of Anthero de Quental,' together with the poet's autobiography, translated from the Portuguese by Mr. E. Prestage.—'W. H. Widgey, Schoolmaster,' a selection from his writings, edited with memoir by Mr. W. K. Hill.—'Wolfram von Eschenbach Parsival,' translated for the first time into English and annotated by Miss Jessie Weston.—and 'Studies and Essays in Biblical Archaeology and Semitic Folk-lore,' by Mr. Joseph Jacobs. In the course of the summer will appear 'The Grimm Library,' a collection of monographs in folk-lore. Among the earliest volumes will be: 'Mingrelian Folk-Tales,' translated by Miss M. Wardrop.—'Finnish Proverbs,' translated and annotated by Miss Bayley.—'Perseus, the Virgin-Born Dragon Slayer,' a study, by Mr. Sidney Hartland.—and 'The Story of Bran mac Febail, being the oldest Irish Version of the Visit to the Other World,' edited and translated by Prof. Kuno Meyer, with essays upon the Celtic Paradise and the Celtic idea of reincarnation by Mr. Alfred Nutt. Also 'Birds, Beasts, and Fishes of the Norfolk Broadland,' figured and described by Mr. P. H. Emerson.

Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co. will issue 'Vox Clamantium: the Gospel of the People,' a volume by various writers on social questions of the day.—Prof. R. K. Douglas's new book 'Society in China,'—the first volume of a translation, by the Rev. A. H. Johnson and Miss Todd, of Dr. Busch's 'History of England under the Tudors,'—and 'The Worlds of Space,' a popular volume on astronomy, by Mr. J. E. Gore.

THE FORGED LAWS OF THE CONQUEOR AND THE CONFESSOR.

DR. LIEBERMANN has ready in the press yet another forerunner of his great work upon the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman laws and institutes, with the title 'Leges Anglorum Londoniæ Seculo xiii. Ineunte Collectæ,' of which we are enabled to give the following outline.

It is well known that the palpable interpolations in the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor and of William I. have for a long time past proved a source of error and difficulty to constitutional historians, and that it has been generally agreed to refer the motive of these interpolations to the period of the dispute about the English supremacy under Edward I. The brilliant argument of Bishop Stubbs, in his preface to Hoveden (Rolle), perhaps contributed most to what almost seemed at one time a final settlement of the question; but even then Bishop Stubbs, with his usual sagacity, recognized the possibility of the interpolations in question being both by the same hand, and, moreover, the handiwork of a Londoner. This surmise, which the Bishop was then unable to verify, is the key to the solution of the problem, and Dr. Liebermann, with his unequalled knowledge of the "pedigree" of our twelfth century MSS. and his unexampled industry in collating the same, has to all appearance been completely successful in assigning these famous interpolations to their true date and locality.

The collection of legal and historical pieces used by this interpolator is most characteristic, and can be easily distinguished in the several MSS. which have preserved copies. It was doubtless due to the fact that the best-known of these copies, such as the Corpus, Oriel, and Cottonian MSS., are in the handwriting of the early years of the fourteenth century, that the interpolations were first assigned to the reign of Edward I.; but Dr. Liebermann is now able to show that these versions, as well as the texts of Selden and Twyden, have been derived from a lost archetype. Perhaps the most curious feature in the case is that interpolations by the same scribe are actually to be found in the Red Book of the Exchequer, which was compiled as early as the year 1230, and then from an exemplar of about the year 1212. This single piece of evidence thus disposes completely of the motive-theory of an Edwardian forgery; but, apart from this, Dr. Liebermann has conclusively shown that the interpolator wrote in the reign of John. For example, though the chief object of these interpolations was to magnify the historical importance of the City of London, there is no allusion to the antiquity of the office of mayor. This would have been mere effrontery on the part of a contemporary of the first Mayor of London; but a scribe writing a century later would have had no such scruples. This is only one of numerous convincing proofs adduced by Dr. Liebermann that the compiler and interpolator of the laws of the Confessor flourished in the reign of King John, and that he probably used Magna Charta and other recent documents for the purpose of his compilation.

It is in the dissection of this work that Dr. Liebermann appears at his best, distinguishing unerringly between old and new information and exposing the whole system of the forger.

The latter is regarded by Dr. Liebermann somewhat favourably. It is true that he appears at times extremely pedantic, and at others almost childish in his credulity; but for all that he must have been a far-sighted politician, unless, indeed, we are to suppose that the idea of a monarchy of Great Britain with a caput regni in London was seriously considered in the first years of the thirteenth century. If so, however, we must suppose that the various passages relating to Scotland, as well as the several precedents entered in the Red Book of the Exchequer, from the Treaty of Falaise to the end of the reign of Henry III., which were produced as evidence in support of the English imperial claims in 1290, must have been preserved with a political purpose—a very inconvenient supposition. In any case, the interpolations of this early thirteenth century scribe will be found to include such familiar assertions as "Northumberland usque ad Forth, scilicet Loonia et Galweya," and there are some still more archaic references to the creation of a number of Scandinavian earls of Northumberland, Cumberland, &c., as well as of Huntingdon, interpolated before the laws of Cnut, who is here described as "Rex Anglorum Britonum et Danorum, Sweforum et Norwegarum." Then, again, we have a further "prehistoric peep," with the mention of a certain "Beorn Comes Ducus" with his "auriculæ ursi."

The whole of these geographical notices are most remarkable; and now that we are assured that they must be dated back to the earliest years of the thirteenth century, it only remains for us to suppose that this intimate knowledge of the North Sea and Baltic must have been obtained from a Scandinavian or Hanseatic source; and, after all, as much or more was known of the far East in the twelfth century. But a further question is seriously raised by Dr. Liebermann's discovery, which appears to us to be of even greater importance. Is it not possible that these supposed assertions are merely the day-dreams of a patriotic Londoner, and that they have less connexion with political than with commercial considerations—that they were found by Edward I., and merely used by him as historical evidence, just as he requisitioned the registers of the English monasteries? Dr. Liebermann seems to some extent to favour this theory. In any case, the work which he has prepared will have an equal interest to civic and to Northern antiquaries.

Literary Gossip.

MR. P. HUMZ BROWN, the author of the 'Life of Buchanan,' has nearly completed his promised 'Life of John Knox.' It will contain an important composition of Knox, hitherto unpublished, as well as several other new documents, which will throw fresh light on the Reformer's continental career, and on the foreign influences at work in the religious movement in Scotland.

THE autograph manuscript of Sir Walter Scott's 'Life of Napoleon Buonaparte' will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby this month. With the exception of 'Guy Mannering,' which Messrs. Sotheby sold about ten years ago, no more interesting manuscript of Scott's has come into the market for many years, and it is sincerely to be hoped that British collectors will not allow it to leave the country. The only important manuscript of Scott's which has occurred in a sale since 'Guy Mannering' is 'The Life of Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's,' which was in the portion of the Philipps collection that Messrs. Sotheby sold last June. Into whose collection this passed we do not know; but 'Guy Mannering' graces the library of an American amateur.

ONE of the most interesting issues from the Kelmscott Press is to be a limited edition of Mr. Swinburne's 'Atalanta,' with specially designed borders. This will appear very shortly.

It is said, but we give the rumour for what it is worth, that the Secondary Education Bill and the Teachers' Registration Bill, urgent as is the demand for both measures in the scholastic world, will now be held back for the report of the Secondary Education Commission. A Bill to give effect to the Report of the Gresham University Commission is promised early in next session.

THE Royal Commission to inquire into certain questions connected with secondary education was constituted a fortnight ago, but there has been an unexplained delay in making public the names of the commissioners and the precise instructions to be given to them.

AN exceptional copy of the Abbotsford edition of the Waverley Novels has just been sold under the hammer. It consisted of seventeen volumes, the last five comprising the miscellaneous works, poems, 'Tales of a Grandfather,' &c., and Lockhart's 'Life of Scott.' Although the twelve-volume edition of the novels often finds its way to the auction room, the seventeen volumes rarely turn up. Though it was bound in "russia," it was knocked down at the modest sum of 13*l.* 10*s.*

'MARCELLA,' Mrs. Humphry Ward's new story, which is to be published over here by Messrs. Smith & Elder, and in New York by Messrs. Macmillan, will be a shorter novel than 'David Grieve,' although, like it, it will be divided into four books.

THE report of the directors of the Booksellers' Provident Institution for the year 1893 mentions that the yearly income has fallen off to some extent, owing to the life subscriptions of certain members having been completed. In consequence of the deaths of some of the annuitants, the amount granted for relief has been rather less than in the preceding year; 592*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* has been expended in permanent assistance, and 890*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* in temporary assistance, including grants for funerals. Three widows have died, their ages being seventy-three, eighty-two, and eighty-five years, who during their lifetime received 709*l.*, 397*l.*, and 662*l.* respectively, making a total of 1,768*l.* Their husbands, to secure these benefits, paid in subscriptions the small sum of 85*l.* 9*s.* in all. Seven members have died (among them Mr. James Toovey, a vice-president), and nine have joined. 50*l.* has been received from the executors of the late Mr. Alfred Taylor (of the firm of Messrs. Hatchard), who joined on the foundation of the institution in 1837. For the vacancy created among the trustees by the election of Mr. C. J. Longman to the presidency, the valuable services of Mr. F. Macmillan have been secured.

CONSIDERABLE curiosity has been evinced respecting the authorship of the powerful serial story 'With Edged Tools,' which has been running for some months in the Cornhill Magazine. We understand that when published in book form the work will be found to bear on its title-page the name of Mr. H. S. Merriman, the author of 'The Slave of the Lamp,' &c.

MR. W. P. COURTNEY is engaged in preparing a work on 'Whist and Whist-Players,' which will be partly anecdotal and partly historical, and will probably appear in the autumn.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE is putting the last touches to a novel which will begin to appear in the April numbers of the Revue de Paris. It is to be called 'Le Lys Rouge,' and is a study of cosmopolitan society in Florence. One of the heroines is English, and æsthetic. It will be interesting to watch M. France poaching on M. Bourget's ground.

UNDER the title 'Lombard Street in Lent' the sermons on social subjects which are being preached in St. Edmund's, Lombard Street, will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock, each sermon being specially revised by the preacher.

MR. EVELYN ABBOTT, who has undertaken to prepare a biography of the late Master of Balliol, will be glad to receive letters and other matters of biographical interest from old friends and pupils of Prof. Jowett.

FOR the past half year Messrs. Cassell & Co., Limited, are declaring, subject to audit, a dividend at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum, which, with the already declared interim dividend, gives 8 per cent. for the year 1893.

THE second series of 'The Diplomatic Reminiscences of Lord Augustus Loftus' deals with the period of his residence at the Court of Bavaria (1862-66), that of his embassy at Berlin (1866-71), and that of his embassy to St. Petersburg (1872-79).

MESSRS. SONNENSCHEIN & Co. will publish before Easter 'The Diary of a Cavalry Officer in the Peninsular and Waterloo Campaigns,' being the diary of the late Lieut.-Col. W. Tomkinson, of the 16th Light Dragoons, edited by his son, Mr. James Tomkinson, J.P., of Willington Hall, Tarporey. The diary covers the period from April, 1809, to Christmas Day, 1815. It will be illustrated by five maps and three etchings.

THE Edinburgh Bibliographical Society held a meeting on Thursday, the 22nd ult., when a paper was read on Thomas Finlason, the earliest Edinburgh printer of the seventeenth century, and one of the most important. The connexion between his press and that of Waldegrave and others of the older printers was traced, and illustrated by books from the several presses.

PROF. CAMPBELL FRASER has just completed his annotated edition of Locke's 'Essay concerning Human Understanding,' to be published by the Clarendon Press. Prof. Fraser has been appointed Gifford Lecturer at Edinburgh for the academic years 1894-1896.

THE University of St. Petersburg, which now numbers upwards of 2,600 students, celebrated on the 8th (20th) ult. the seventy-fifth anniversary of its foundation. Originally the principal "pedagogical" institute of the empire, it was transformed in 1819 into a university. Russian papers pointed out on the occasion of the anniversary the curious fact that Count L. N. Tolstoi, having been obliged to quit the University of Moscow on account of "incapacity," took his degree at that of St. Petersburg.

THE only Parliamentary Papers of general interest this week are Pauperism (England and Wales), Return A, December, 1893 (2*d.*); and Second General Annual Report of the Board of Trade under Section 29 of the Companies Winding-Up Act, 1890 (7*d.*).

SCIENCE

THE LITERATURE OF FORESTRY.

British Forest Trees and their Sylvicultural Characteristics and Treatment. By John Nisbet, D.(Sc. (Macmillan & Co.).—The severe depression to which agriculture has been and still is subjected has called the attention of landed proprietors to their woods and plantations. At the present prices for timber there does not seem to be much consolation obtainable from this source. But in timber growing, more than in any other form of industry, it is necessary to look beyond the interests of the moment, and to forecast, as far as possible, the probabilities of the future. Thus considered, the prospects of "sylviculture" seem to be good. There is an enormous and ever-increasing demand for timber, and the sources of supply, as in Sweden and the United States, are slowly but surely becoming exhausted. Again, there are within our own island thousands of acres now yielding no return at all, which might be utilized with eventual profit if judiciously planted. Something has been done in this direction in the Isle of Man, and in some parts of Ireland, but much more remains to be done. It is requisite, however, that the superintendence and general management should be entrusted to agents and wood-managers who have had—as very few hitherto have had—a thorough grounding in scientific principles and an adequate practical training. Without these we shall go on in the old ways, and our woodlands will remain valuable rather as game preserves or deer forests (!) than for the crops they are capable of yielding. Till recently our forest literature has not been abundant, and its quality has not been such that we could boast of it. Both France and Germany have been ahead of us in these particulars, and it is only lately that the appreciation of this fact has begun to filter through the minds of those concerned in this country. Now that, under the auspices of our County Councils, instruction is being supplied in entomology, botany, and chemistry, so far as they are applicable to the needs of cultivators of the soil, it is not unlikely that an abundant crop of books may appear. Among them a good treatise adapted to the conditions of forestry in Great Britain is desirable; for whilst, on the one hand, the elaborate treatise of Dr. Schlich must hold the field as the most important treatise on the subject in our language, it is not so well suited to the requirements of landed proprietors and foresters who have to deal with relatively small areas, forming part only of their estates; on the other hand, the present book is not so well done as materially to affect the fortunes of another more suitable to our local circumstances. In the present volume the author draws a distinction between arboriculture, or the cultivation of individual trees as specimens, and sylviculture, or the management of woods. He commends our arboriculture and condemns our sylviculture. There is some truth in this classification and some justice in the condemnation; but we do not think the author himself quite grasps the notion that arboriculture, in his sense of the term, as applied to the proper culture of the individual tree, should, mutatis mutandis, be taken as the example to be followed in the management of the wood. Again, the sylviculturist deals with some thirty species at the most, generally with many fewer; but the arboriculturist has to deal with scores or hundreds of species, among which are many which, in all probability, will be found quite as valuable as timber producers as any we now have. Of course, time and experience are required before the correctness of this surmise can be proved or disproved, but that experiment and inquiry are absolutely necessary is shown by the failure of the larch in many districts of the country. The present work is mostly founded on German and French sources, and the translation is not always well executed; at least, we attribute to faulty translation such expressions as "The leaves of pines in each sheath are divided as follows: Whole leaf in each sheaf divided into two needles.....whole leaf in each sheaf divided into three needles," &c. As a means of calling attention to the leading points to be considered in the management of woods this treatise will be serviceable.

The Protection of Woodlands against Dangers arising from Organic and Inorganic Causes. By Hermann Fürst. Authorized Translation by John Nisbet, D.Cc. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)—The original basis of this work is Kaushinger's 'Lehre vom Waldschutz,' of which Dr. Fürst issued a fourth completely revised and rearranged edition in 1889. Now comes an officer of the Indian Forest Service to give us a translation of a book primarily intended for the use of foresters in Central Europe. It is necessary for the practitioners of forestry in this country making use of this book to bear these facts in mind, and to make allowances accordingly. The first thing to be considered from this point of view is the difference of climate as illustrated in our moister atmosphere, relatively sunless summers, and treacherous springs. Again, although the pests, whether of insects or of fungi, which injure our woods, are mostly the same as those met with in Germany, yet the results are not so disastrous here as on the Continent—a circumstance due partly to climate, partly to the lesser area under cultivation as forest land, to the more isolated position of our woods, and the prevalence of mixed woods, consisting of various descriptions of trees, with or without coppice, rather than of "pure" forests of one species only. The book before us is divided into three sections, according as the injury done to trees arises (1) from climatal or meteorological causes, (2) from parasitic plants or injurious animals, or (3) from the carelessness, the lawlessness, or the wilful misdeeds of man. These subjects are very unequally treated, and some unsatisfactorily. The account of the fungi injurious to trees is very meagre, and little or nothing is said about those phenomena of "symbiosis" and "heteroicism" which are as important to the practical forester as they are interesting to the naturalist.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

The Mittheilungen of the Vienna Geographical Society contains a preliminary report of a year's exploration in Paraguay by Dr. Paul Jordan. The objects of this journey were in the main zoological, but incidentally a good deal of geographical information has been obtained. Dr. Jordan, we believe, is the first European who has ascended the highest summit in the "Cordilleras" of Paraguay, namely, the Cerro Tatuy, which rises to a height of 2,280 ft. He also penetrated into the territory of the Guayaquil Indians (to the east of Villa Rica), who are reported to be only 4 ft. tall, and to live still in the stone age. He never met a single individual of that tribe, but came across several huts, and secured an interesting ethnological collection.

Two accounts of the recent Antarctic expedition, by Mr. W. S. Bruce and Dr. C. W. Donald, are published in the Scottish Geographical Magazine, illustrated with several views and a minute map. The results do not appear to have been at all what was expected, and this not on account of any shortcomings on the part of the scientific men who had been given passages on board the Dundee whalers, but rather because of the unwillingness of the captains to sacrifice material advantages for the sake of science. It is quite clear that if an Antarctic expedition is to yield satisfactory results, it must be undertaken on lines like those recommended by a committee of the Royal Geographical Society recently appointed. Dr. Murray, whose eloquent paper on Antarctic research appeared in a recent number of the Geographical Journal, does not advocate a "dash at the South Pole," but a steady, continuous, laborious, and systematic exploration of the whole Southern region with all the appliances of the modern investigator. Such an exploration may prove of little advantage to trade or commerce, but would redound to the credit of the British navy and of British science. We sincerely hope that the learned bodies interested in this subject may succeed in persuading Government to grant the means necessary for carrying out this proposal.

Dr. W. J. van Bobber, in Petermann's Mittheilungen, publishes an article on the geographical distribution of the extremes of temperature, accompanied by a set of highly interesting maps. The highest temperatures (over 113° F.) are shown to occur in the region, largely consisting of deserts, which stretches from near the Atlantic to the upper valley of the Ganges, in Northern Mexico and the valley of the Rio del Norte, and in Central Australia; whilst the greatest cold (—76° F.) has been observed on the Lena and Upper Yana in Eastern Siberia and in the interior of Greenland. The mean extreme range, that is the difference between the extremes for a number of years, is less than 18° F. over parts of the great oceans, and exceeds 153° F. in a small section of the north-western territory of Canada, including the Great Slave Lake, and in the greater part of Siberia.

The Journal of the Manchester Geographical Society contains three rather interesting papers by Mr. Thomas Weir, Prof. W. Boyd Dawkins, and Prof. T. H. Core, who deal with astronomy, geology, and meteorology in relation to geography. It is to be hoped that the Manchester Geographical Society may succeed in putting itself more abreast of the times, for the part of its journal only now published ought to have been issued in the January of last year.

The Geographical Journal publishes an account of a ride through the whole of Kurdistan, from Erzerum to Baghdad, by Capt. F. R. Maunsell, with a map on a scale apparently far too small to show adequately the geographical information secured by the traveller; a paper on 'The Geography of Mammals,' by Mr. F. L. Sclater, who discusses the six regions first proposed by his father in 1857, and subsequently accepted in substance by Mr. Wallace; and a bright article on 'Commercial Geography,' by Dr. H. R. Mill, whose recent lectures on that subject at the London Institution were highly appreciated by crowded audiences.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

Two more small planets are announced as having been discovered: one by Dr. Wilson, of the Carleton College Observatory, Northfield, Minn., U.S., on January 30th; and the other by M. Courty, of the Bordeaux Observatory, on February 11th. If all the recent announcements prove on further examination to be really new, these will raise the whole number now known to 386.

A very large spot in the southern hemisphere of the sun, visible during several days to the naked eye, has just passed off its disc.

The splendid meteor which was seen at a large number of places in England, Wales, and Ireland within half an hour of noon on the 8th of February appears, according to the calculations of Prof. Rambaut, Royal Astronomer of Ireland (who was himself a witness of it at the Dunsink Observatory), to have passed in a nearly easterly direction from a point above the Irish Sea not far from the Welsh coast to South Yorkshire, where it burst, probably at a height of about fifteen or twenty miles, nearly between Leeds and Sheffield.

The eighth edition of Mr. Lynn's handy little manual Celestial Motions (Stanford) has appeared, carefully brought up to date. The chapter on fixed stars is somewhat enlarged, but that on comets has been shortened, because much of the matter is given in the same author's Remarkable Comets, of which a second edition appears simultaneously with the above.

The Berliner Astronomisches Jahrbuch has recently been published for 1896, the data being similar to those in preceding years. Apparent places each day are given for six close circumpolar stars; each fifth day for three others within 10° of the Pole; and each tenth day for 409 other stars. Elements of 372 of the small planets are tabulated.

THE GREAT AUK.

Magdalene College, Cambridge, Feb. 24, 1894.

IMAGINATION has long had a large share in the accounts given of the garafowl or great auk, notwithstanding the efforts of those who have tried to set forth nothing but the truth on the subject, yet I do not call to mind meeting with so "many inventions" regarding it as have appeared in the newspapers within the last week, on the occasion of the recent sale of a specimen of the egg of that bird. I should occupy too much space were I to dwell upon them; but I would ask for the admission of a few lines in which to state what is known exactly of the origin of that specimen, which I well remember in the collection of the late Mr. Yarrell. He told me, as he told others of his friends, that he bought it in Paris; and, to the best of my belief, not many years after the peace of 1815. In a little curiosity shop, of mean appearance, he saw a number of eggs hanging on a string; he recognized one of them as an egg of Alca impennis, and asking their price was told that they were one franc apiece, except the large one, which, from its size, was worth two francs. He paid the money and walked away with the egg in his hat. That is the whole story on which so imposing an edifice has been built, and the only "variant" of it deserving of consideration is to the effect that the price of the big egg was five instead of two francs. I may add that this simple story was published by the late owner of the egg, the Baron Louis d'Hamonville, in the Bulletin of the French Zoological Society for 1891 (tom. xvi. p. 34).

ALFRED NEWTON.

THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON.

Messrs. CROSBY LOCKWOOD & SON announce the following illustrated works: 'The Sanitary Arrangements of Dwelling-Houses: a Popular Guide for Householdiers,' by Mr. A. J. Wallis T aylor, crown 8vo.,—'Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration: an Historical Sketch,' by Mr. J. S. Jeans,—a second edition of 'Engineering Chemistry: a Practical Treatise for the Use of Analytical Chemists, Engineers, Iron Masters,' &c., by Mr. H. J. Phillips,—'Milk, Cheese, and Butter: a Practical Handbook on their Properties and Production,' illustrated, by Mr. John Oliver,—'Cotton Manufacture: a Manual of Practical Instruction,' by Mr. John Lister, of Pendleton, and 'Practical Paper-Making: a Manual for Paper-Makers,' by Mr. Geo. Clapperton, paper-maker.

SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL.—Feb. 21.—Dr. H. Woodward, President, in the chair.—The Rev. J. T. Pinfold, Messrs. T. Hargreaves, W. M. Hutchings, A. E. Lardner, and J. Nevin were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On the Relations of the Basic and Acid Rocks of the Tertiary Volcanic Series of the Inner Hebrides,' by Sir A. Geikie, and 'Note on the Genus Naladites, as occurring in the Coal Formation of Nova Scotia,' by Sir J. W. Dawson, with an appendix by Dr. W. Hind.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—Feb. 26.—Mr. C. R. Markham, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Capt. A. Campbell, Lieut. F. W. Green, Rev. W. A. Colledge, Messrs E. Foa, J. R. Harrington, A. G. Hartley, F. Harris, E. C. F. James, A. Knox, E. H. Lambert, J. R. Rodd, J. B. Stanford, G. H. William, and E. W. Winton.—The paper read was 'Explorations on the Upper Mekong, Siam,' by Mr. H. Warrington Smyth.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—Feb. 15.—Mr. A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—Sir H. H. Howarth exhibited a jug of English earthenware of the "greybeard" type, with a boss in front with the initials E. B. circumscribed: 18. NE. ME. STONE. PAS: 1874.—Sir J. Evans suggested that the meaning of this was "I will not stir," or crack, like a glass bottle.—Mrs. Kingdon, through Mr. E. Clarke, exhibited a quantity of fragments of grey Roman pottery, including wasters, from a field called Alice Holt, near Farnham.—The President exhibited a planispheric astrolabe of English make, and a small gold ring dial of German manufacture with a shield of arms thereon.—Mr. W. H. St. John Hope, by permission of Mr. Fitzhugh and the Right Rev. Bishop Butt, exhibited and described two sculptured alabaster panels, one with a representation of the Holy Trinity, retaining much of its original colouring, the other representing the exposition of some saint's relics. Both panels are of Nottingham work of the close of the fifteenth century.—Prof. Middleton exhibited a fragment of another alabaster panel with portion of a group representing the betrayal of our Lord.—Mr. Money exhibited a bronze purse bar of the fourteenth century, found in the Thames, with inscription in allelo; a portion of a rude stone figure of Roman date, found at Froxfield, Wilts; and a quantity of tesserae, probably of Elizabethan date, formed of green, brown, and yellow glazed pottery and of horses' teeth ground into a suitable shape.

Feb. 22.—Mr. A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—The President called attention to the fact that a meeting had been summoned by the Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt to protest against a proposal to construct a dam across the Nile a little below the island of Philæ, the effect of which would be to totally submerge the famous Temple of Isis and other ancient remains on the island. With a view of strengthening their hands, and of recording the Society's own opinion against such a scheme, he proposed the following resolution, which was seconded by Dr. Freshfield, treasurer, and carried unanimously: "That the Society of Antiquaries of London desires to record its protest in the strongest manner against the threatened submergence and consequent destruction of the venerable and famous Temple of Isis, and of other ancient Egyptian remains on the island of Philæ, through the proposed construction of a dam across the Nile immediately below. The Society further desires to express its opinion that the suggested transfer of the remains to an adjacent island would destroy their historical and artistic value, inasmuch as one of the most important and special interests attaching to these buildings is their singular adaptation to their peculiar site, which is, moreover, one of extraordinary natural beauty, and forms one of the chief attractions for foreign visitors to Egypt."—Mr. Acutt exhibited a sketch of part of a lock found in the church of St. Mary Magdalene, Knight-bridge Street.—Mr. M. Browne exhibited an engraved steel casket of German work of the sixteenth century.—The President exhibited a wonderfully perfect woven stole of the thirteenth century, with fyfot and other patterns.—Mr. S. Montagu, M.P., exhibited a splendid cope of green bawdekyn, with orphreys embroidered with six scenes from the life of St. John Baptist, of late fifteenth century Flemish work, with traces of Spanish influence.—Mr. J. G. Waller exhibited and read a paper descriptive of a number of tracings of figures of saints in stained glass at West Wickham, Kent.—Mr. E. Clark read an account of the palimpsest brass of Sir Anthony and Dame Fitzherbert in Norbury Church, Derbyshire, rubbings of which were exhibited, as well as a supposed portrait of Sir Anthony.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Feb. 21.—Mr. A. Wyon in the chair.—The Rev. H. T. Owen contributed a description of the excavations which he has had effected at Valle Crucis Abbey, Llangollen. The entire ground plan of the cloister court has been laid open for observation, the remains being very perfect.—Mr. F. Williams reported the uncovering of a long length of the Roman wall of Chester, at the Roodway; also some discoveries in Watergate Street.—Mr. M. Jones, City Surveyor, Chester, gave a description of some other discoveries in Watergate Street, where a portion of a Roman villa has been found, and carefully preserved for inspection.—Mr. Oliver sent a rubbing from a brass at Lydn, in which the old custom of riding the stang is represented beneath the effigy of the deceased who is commemorated on the brass.—Mr. Bodger exhibited a fine collection of Roman coins found near Caistor, Northants, and Mr. Loftus Brock described some Roman coins found at Springhead, Gravesend, on which Christian emblems were represented. They were of emperors later than the time of Constantine. He exhibited also a coin of Crispus. On the reverse the emperor held a standard in each hand, both standards having the monogram of Christ.—The Chairman exhibited a silver communion cup, belonging to St. Stilian Church, Cornwall. There are no hall marks, but it is dated 1570. He exhibited also some designs of seals of the county of Glamorgan, from deeds preserved at Margam Abbey.—A paper by Dr. Fryer on some ancient glass which has recently been placed in Lamborne Church, Berks, was then read.—It was followed by a paper, 'On Riding the Stang, and Riding Skimmington,' by Mr. E. B. Barrett. The former consisted in placing the delinquent upon a stang, or three-angled pole, and supported thereon he was carried about by two men. Skimmington was the punishment reserved at the hands of the populace for wife-beaters, or vicariously for others, who were thus punished by deputy. Many curious details of these singular customs of our ancestors were supplied, and in the discussion which followed it was shown that traces still remain in many districts, the most popular survival being the rough music brought before the house of some unpopular inhabitant by his neighbours.

ZOOLOGICAL.—Feb. 20.—Prof. G. B. Howes in the chair.—A report was read, drawn up by Mr. A. Thomson, on the insects bred in the insect-house during the season of 1893. Examples of seventeen species of Bombyces, twenty of diurnal Lepidoptera, and twenty-four of nocturnal Lepidoptera had been exhibited during the past season, of which many had not been shown in former years. Amongst these were specimens of the fine insect Actias wissleri, from South-East Africa, hatched from cocoons presented by the Rev. H. A. Junod.—Mr. O. Thomas called attention to the skin of a giraffe from Somaliland, and pointed out its differences from the South African giraffe.—Communications were read: from Dr. E. W. Shufeldt, on the methods of preparing specimens of certain invertebrates for public exhibition employed in the U. S. National Museum, by Mr. Sowerby, from Dr. O. F. von Moellendorff, on a collection of land-shells from the Sannui Islands, Gulf of Siam; these land-shells were referred to thirty-three species, of which many were described as new to science, from Dr. D. Sharp, on the Hemiptera Heteroptera of the families Anthracidae and Ceratocombidae, collected by Mr. H. H. Smith in the island of St. Vincent, with descriptions of new genera and species, prepared by Prof. P. K. Uhler, upon specimens submitted to him by the West-Indian Committee, from Mr. O. Thomas, the third of his contributions towards our knowledge of the mammals of Nyassaland, based, as the two former, on specimens forwarded to the British Museum by Mr. H. H. Johnston, C.B., H.B.M. Commissioner in British Central Africa; the present paper contained remarks on thirty-five mammals, of which two were described as new, and were named respectively Lepus schyleri and Procapra johannstoni, and from Dr. K. W. Shufeldt, on the conclusions at which he had arrived respecting the affinities of the birds of the order Steganopodes.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Feb. 21.—Mr. R. Inwards, President, in the chair.—Messrs R. M. Barrington, C. G. L. Cator, and H. Owen were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'Temperature, Rainfall, and Sunshine at Las Palmas, Grand Canary,' by Dr. J. Cleasby Taylor. The author gave the results of his observations during the five years 1889-93.—'Report on the Phenological Observations for 1893,' by Mr. E. Mawley. This is a discussion of the observations made on the flowering of plants, appearance of insects, and the song and nesting of birds. The year 1893 was in complete contrast to its predecessor, being very forward throughout the United Kingdom. The February and March plants were later than usual in blossoming, especially in the colder parts of our islands, but after this the dates were everywhere in advance of the average, and during the height of the flowering season the departures from the mean were often considerable.—'Comparative Observations with two Thermometer Screens at Ilfracombe,' by Mr. W. Marriott. Some exception having been taken to the thermometer screen which has been in use at Ilfracombe for a number of years past, a Stevenson screen was placed at a distance of sixty feet from the old screen in October, 1892, since which date simultaneous observations in the two screens have been made daily at 9 A.M. The results of this comparison show that the temperature deduced from the two sets of observations agrees closely, the old screen being only 0·3 higher than the Stevenson.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Feb. 27.—Mr. A. Giles, President, in the chair.—Two papers were read, relating respectively to the construction and the electrical equipment of the Liverpool Overhead Railway: the first paper, entitled 'The Liverpool Overhead Railway,' by Messrs J. H. Greathead and F. Fox; and the second paper, entitled 'The Electrical Equipment of the Liverpool Overhead Railway,' by Mr. T. Parker.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Feb. 26.—Mr. H. Stannus delivered the second lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Decorative Treatment of Artificial Foliage.'

Feb. 27.—Mr. H. Donaldson in the chair.—A paper 'On Goldsmith Work: Past and Present' was read before a meeting of the Applied Arts Section by Mrs. F. Newman. The paper was fully illustrated by photographic transparencies of old work in the British and other museums, prepared by Mr. Newman.—In the discussion which followed, Sir G. Birdwood gave some interesting information with regard to Indian work, and remarks were also made by Mr. C. Thomas, Mr. H. Stannus, and others.

Feb. 28.—Sir F. Bramwell in the chair.—A paper 'On Rainfall Records in the United Kingdom' was read by Mr. O. J. Symons.—A discussion followed.

ARISTOTELIAN.—Feb. 19.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. B. Bouanquet read a paper 'On the Conception of Soul in Plato and Aristotle.' Starting from Bacon's opposition of "substance" to "words of second intention" in criticizing Aristotle's definition of mind, the writer examined passages from the 'Phædrus' and 'Timæus,' in connexion with Aristotle's definition of mind in the 'De Anima,' and with his conception of productive reason. The treatment was divided into the general heads of motion and of consciousness, and its tendency was to affirm the fundamental correspondence of Plato's view with that of Aristotle, and the absence of what moderns mean by "substance" in both. Especially it was suggested that the relation between the mortal and immortal elements of the human soul as described in the 'Timæus' is correlative to that between the receptive and productive factors of mind in the 'De Anima,' and an interpretation of the "productive reason" was propounded, based on Aristotle's reference, in treating of it, to the passage in which "light" and "reason" are spoken of in connexion ('Republic,' 508 D).—The paper was followed by a discussion.

PHYSICAL.—Feb. 23.—Prof. A. W. Rüchler, President, in the chair.—Mr. J. W. Kearton was elected a Member.—'A Note on a New Electrical Theorem' was read by Mr. T. H. Blakesley.—Prof. C. V. Boys read a note on the 'Attachment of Quartz Fibres,' and Mr. Littlewood read a note on 'A Method of determining Refractive Indices,' particularly well adapted for either homogeneous or heterogeneous liquids.

The Mummy: Chapters on Egyptian Funereal Archaeology. By E. A. Wallis Budge, Litt.D. With Eighty-eight Illustrations. (Cambridge, University Press.)

THE various articles here grouped together under the appropriate title of 'The Mummy' were originally collected (for a good part had been published before) as an introduction to the catalogue of the Egyptian collection in the Fitzwilliam Museum. This destination explains the character of the work, which resembles a catalogue or dictionary more than any species of literature proper. There are no chapters, no welcome "false titles" or restful blank pages, from first to last; but section methodically follows section, with just a gasp, in the form of a heading, to show where a new subject begins. It is emphatically a work of reference to be consulted when wanted, not a book to be read through for general ideas or theories. Indeed, Mr. Budge ascetically abjures theories, and confines himself to sober fact. People who want deductions and generalizations, enthusiasm and impressions, must go elsewhere; such things are not tolerated in the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum. But those who seek a summary of the latest "morning state" of the legion of Egyptian discoveries will find their want exactly filled by Mr. Budge's admirable work. It is the Egyptian 'Enquire Within upon Everything,' brought up to the year 1893. Without the slightest attempt to be interesting, without a solitary charm of style, it is yet a book that no archaeologist can afford to dispense with. The learning of its compiler, set forth with the stern conciseness of science, is a sufficient guarantee for its accuracy; the collection of archaeological data is very large; and the bibliography conveyed in multitudinous foot-notes, whilst testifying to the conscientious labour of the writer, forms by no means the least valuable feature to those who would follow up the study. As a text-book of the present state of knowledge in regard to Egyptian antiquities, in most of its branches, 'The Mummy' is admirable. It needs a good deal of unswathing before its beauty can be fully appreciated, for Mr. Budge is not one to make a student's path "fatally facile"; but every one who once gets over his somewhat repelling manner will end by being thoroughly grateful.

The title, it is true, has an alluring popular ring about it which is out of keeping with the scientific severity of the contents. It sounds like a new novel by the author of 'An Egyptian Princess.' Yet no title could be more completely expressive of the scope of the book. Almost all Egyptian archaeology centres in the mummy. As the christener says:—

"The monuments and remains of ancient Egypt preserved in the great museums of Europe and Egypt are chiefly of a sepulchral nature, and we owe them entirely to the belief of the Egyptians that the soul would at some period revivify the body, and to the care, consequent on this belief, with which they embalmed the bodies of their dead, so that they might resist the action of decay, and be ready for the return of the soul. The preservation of the embalmed body, or mummy, was the chief end and aim of every Egyptian who wished for everlasting life. For the sake of the mummy's safety tombs were hewn, papyri were inscribed with compositions, the knowledge of which would enable him to repel the attacks of demons, ceremonies were performed and services were recited; for the sake of the comfort of the mummy and his ka, or genius, the tombs were decorated with scenes which would remind him of those with which he was familiar when upon earth, and they were also provided with many objects used by him in daily life, so that his tomb might resemble as much as possible his old home."

A description of the mummy and its surroundings, therefore, involves not merely embalming, coffins, sarcophagi, and funeral obsequies, but the tomb itself (including, of course, the pyramid, biggest of tombs), its inscriptions, and its contents, stoles, vases, statues, scarabs, and amulets, whether bound up with the mummy or outside the coffin. In other words, the mummy and its entourage may almost be called the sum of Egyptian archaeology, for what is not connected with it is quite a small branch of the science. Even the history of the Egyptian dynasties is a department of momiology, for the tablets of Abydos and Sakkarah belonged to temples which are connected with that future life and day of judgment for which the mummy lies patiently waiting—in a glass case, mayhap, in the British Museum. Mr. Budge, however, excludes the temples from his compendium, and the exclusion is to be regretted. The notion that the Theban temples are but the vestibules to the tombs concealed behind them in the Bibân el-Mulûk may be over-fanciful; but at least it furnishes an excuse for adding the temple to the other monuments, if only for completeness' sake. Still, limits of space had doubtless to be considered in deciding the precise scope of the work.

We do not reach the mummy itself till we are half through the volume. An outline of the history of Egypt comes first, followed by a useful table of the cartouches of most of the Egyptian kings, which occupies half as much space as the history itself. It is simply reprinted from Mr. Budge's little book called 'The Nile,' published only three years ago. Indeed, nearly a third of 'The Mummy' is almost a verbatim reprint from 'The Nile,' and a good deal of the rest is reproduced from Mr. Budge's 'Prefatory Remarks on Egyptian Mummies,' privately printed in 1890. Of course, this in no wise detracts from the usefulness of the expanded volume; it merely takes off the edge of its freshness. The historical sections, however, are not reprinted from the earlier work, and, jejune as Mr. Budge compels himself to be, the brief summary of Egyptian history down to the Persian conquest comprised in these fifty pages will be found of considerable service. Mr. Budge repeats his former statement that "there is no doubt whatever" of the Caucasian race of the ancient Egyptians; though, however right he may be, "there is no doubt" that several authorities consider the problem still open to debate. He is more cautious about the language, on which he quotes many opinions, but contents himself with admitting, for his own part, that it "belongs wholly neither to the Indo-European nor to the Semitic family of languages." Nor will he commit himself as to dates: he generally follows Brugsch, but he does not say he is right. Caution characterizes all his historical statements, and this no doubt adds to their value. We may be pretty sure that we have the truth, though prudence forbids the revelation of the whole truth until further discoveries come to substantiate it. A dry summary of facts is really much more satisfactory than an imaginative restoration of history as it might have been. As an example of Mr. Budge's reserved attitude we may cite his doubts about the Hyksos monuments and the sentence, "Rameses II. is generally thought to have been the oppressor of the Jews in Egypt, and it was probably for him that they built the treasure cities of Pithom and Raameses." We imagined that M. Naville had settled this point; but his results were published by the Egypt Exploration Fund, with which society, to judge by the present volume, Mr. Budge is not personally acquainted. Such indications of private opinion as the following are rare in his pages:—

"With the coming to the throne of Usertsen III. a new period of prosperity began for Egypt. He recognized very soon that the tribes of Nubia had to be put down with a strong hand, and he marched into that country, and did not leave it until he had wasted the land, destroyed the crops, and carried off the cattle. In the labours of Usertsen III. to suppress these peoples we have the counterpart of the expeditions of the English against the Mahdi and his Sūdân followers. He foresaw that it was hopeless to expect to master these people if the frontier town of Egypt was Aswân or Wâdy Halfah, hence he went further south and built fortresses at Semneh and Kummeh."

Of the nationality of the Hyksos Mr. Budge expresses no opinion, but the identification of the Cheta with the Hittites of the Bible he regards as a theory "without, in my opinion, the slightest evidence."

A very interesting section, which will be new to some readers, deals with the history of the decipherment of the Rosetta stone. Mr. Budge makes out rather a bad case against Champollion, who appears to have seen Young's work, and then to have denied seeing it. The sum of the question of priority in the discovery is thus stated:—

"Barthélemy and Zoëga had come to the conclusion, long before the labours of Akerblad, Young, and Champollion, that the cartouches contained proper names. Akerblad drew up an alphabet of the demotic character, in which fourteen signs appear to have had correct values attributed to them. Young published a demotic alphabet in which the greater number of Akerblad's results were absorbed; he fixed the correct values to six hieroglyphic characters, and to three others partly correct values; he identified the names of Ptolemy and Alexander, the numerals and several gods' names. Champollion published a demotic alphabet, the greater part of which he owed, without question, to Akerblad, and a hieroglyphic alphabet of which six characters had had correct values assigned to them by Young, and the value of three others had been correctly stated as far as the consonants were concerned. There was no doubt whatever that Champollion's plan of work was eminently scientific, and his great knowledge of Coptic enabled him to complete the admirable work of decipherment which his natural talent had induced him to undertake. The value of his contributions to the science of Egyptology it would be difficult to overestimate, and the amount of work which he did in his comparatively short life is little less than marvellous. It is, however, to be regretted that Champollion did not state more clearly what Young had done, for a full acknowledgment of this would have in no way injured or lessened his own immortal fame."

This is putting the case mildly and politely; and to ordinary readers it would probably be sufficient, without the thirty pages of historical dissertation which precede it, and which, however interesting and learned in themselves, seem a little out of place in a text-book.

The graphic account of an Egyptian funeral brings us to the mummy proper, embalming in all its processes, mummy cloth, canopic jars, Ushabtiu figures, and all the appurtenances of the tomb, including a very interesting section on scarabs and their forgeries, a subject on which Mr. Budge and Mr. Petrie do not agree. Every one knows that Mr. Budge is an expert in unrolling mummies, and this part of his book is full of minute details substantiated by ample references. Few people, however, are aware that Egyptian mummies were used three hundred years ago—not, as recently, for manure, but as ordinary drugs in the apothecaries' shops. The Jews were the great purveyors of mummy, and one physician was noted for the frequency with which he proscribed it for his patients; it was believed to be good for bruises and wounds. So efficacious was the prescription that, when mummies ran short, defunct criminals and hospital patients were pitched and stuffed with bitumen and then dried in the sun, and these proved an excellent substitute—till found out. This, however, is a somewhat frivolous exception to Mr. Budge's serious matter, and it must not be supposed that he often stoops to be amusing. His work is a solid compendium of accurate information, not very new or original, but precise, trustworthy, and well ordered, and, as such, is deserving of cordial recognition.

William Holman Hunt: his Life and Work. By F. W. Farrar. ('Art Journal' Office).—The Art Annual for 1893 is, with one exception, the least worthy of the series to be called a biography of the painter whose name it bears; on the other hand, it is superior to most of them in the excellence and fidelity of the many capital engravings which illustrate not the artist, but his more ambitious works, such as 'The Light of the World,' 'Christ in the Temple,' and 'The Shadow of Death.' Apart from this several of the minor cuts are monsters of inadequacy, while others, such as the 'Strayed Sheep,' are admirable. The letterpress is chiefly a string of sentimental sermonettes upon, happily, not the painter, but the subjects of some of his pictures, and it contains unaccountable blunders too numerous to mention. Two portraits of melancholy children do not help the letterpress, but the worst thing in the book is a portrait of Mr. Hunt himself, gun in hand, masquerading in his garden at Fulham, and in his costume when painting 'The Scapegoat.' Those noble pictures 'Valentine and Sylvia' and 'The Scapegoat' obtain fairly good treatment in the cuts from them.

The Illustrated Archaeologist. Edited by J. Romilly Allen, F.S.A.Scot. Parts I., II., and III. (C. J. Clark).—The antiquarian student is apt to grumble at the multiplication of archaeological magazines in which a few important papers are buried in a quantity of matter which may be useful from an educational point of view, but has no permanent value. Nevertheless, he will hardly complain of such an addition to his library table as this which Mr. Allen provides. Very often a good drawing is worth much more to the antiquary than pages of letterpress, and except those issued by the Society of Antiquaries and one or two more of the great societies, our antiquarian serial publications are generally deficient as to quantity of illustration, and often defective as to its quality. The special feature of the new magazine is illustration, and if it can be kept up to the level of the beginning it will grow to a very valuable storehouse. That it may do so we are encouraged to hope by the second and third parts being, if anything, better than the first. An excellent feature is the figuring of objects as they pass through the sale-room, often to go one knows not whither, and to be lost to view. Mr. Allen's blocks are sometimes borrowed, but generally new, and as a rule very good, most being based upon photography, which for scientific purposes is generally the best. Of the letterpress little need be said, but there are several good papers, amongst which we would specially mention one in the first part on the sculptured Norman capitals in Southwell Minster, by the editor, and one in the third on flint saws and sickles, by Dr. Munro. We would suggest that in future numbers the table of contents be printed inside the cover or in some other visible place, instead of being buried amongst the advertisements, as it is in these.

An Ordinary of Scottish Arms. By James Balfour Paul, Lyon King of Arms. (Edinburgh, Green & Sons).—It has been said on high authority that "heralds do not know their own foolish business." The present "Lord Lyon" means to prove that technical heraldry is safe in his hands. It is impossible, in days in which an excise licence has democratized the bearing of achievements, to regard the possession or want of a coat of arms as any indication of social status. Yet a good "coat," dating from antiquity, is still worth something, and the historian, at any rate, cannot afford to neglect the gentle sciences. In Scotland, especially, heraldry is more than a handmaid of the graver study. The "heart and stars" of the good Lord James, the daggers of Skene, the lymphads of the Isles, the chief and saltire of the Border, mean much; and the compounded bearings of many families, which rose on the ruin of older houses, have a moral of their own, which can still assist the skilled investigator. The fall of the black Douglasses, alone, is indicated in many coats which date their achievements by that great catastrophe. Again, the mottoes of old families recall incidents of history with dramatic force. "I mak sicker," "Dh'aindheoin co theiridh o," "Vive ut postea vivas," have their meanings to the student. Kirkpatrick, Macdonald, the Johnston whose phoenix rose from the flames of Edward's cavalry skirmishers, live for ever in these adjuncts to their arms. The small area of the country, the fewness and extent of the great surnames, make the lessons of heraldry the common heritage of the people. History is not the métier of our Lyon Herald. He resolutely declines to popularize his science. In his preface he tells us that the lists at his command, in spite of certain efforts of Oliver Cromwell, who several times intruded with the Lyon office, date only from the Act of Charles II. (1672, cap. 47). Under the supervision of Sir Charles Erskine of Cambo, a certain number of the armigerous gentlemen of Scotland registered their bearings according to the statute; but it is to be regretted that many representatives of old baronial houses (some peers among them) neglected their statutory duty, relying, it would seem, on older lists. Such lists appear to have commenced in 1542, under the reign of Sir David Lindsay, though the office of Lyon Herald dates from some two hundred years earlier. Mr. Pepys has recorded the loss at sea of the Scottish records carried off by Cromwell, who took an interest in heraldic matters not hitherto appreciated. The learned author of the 'Ordinary' touches more fluently on the artistic side of his profession. The "adumbration" of certain Hamilton coats, rare tinctures, and an exceptional case of a "single tressure flory" attract his attention. He alludes, too, to the common Scottish feature of the "bordure," which he does not explain. Is it not often a sign of illegitimacy, like the more common "baton sinister," the "bar sinister" of middle-class novelists? Some information on this point, as well as on "compounding," a very special feature of Scottish arms, would enhance the value of a second edition. The book is worth it.

NEW PRINTS.

ONE of the most acceptable studies of tone and colour in the Salon of 1890 was Mr. G. Hitchcock's soft, luminous, and harmonious landscape with figures, which he called 'Maternité,' a young peasant with a baby in her arms and a little boy trudging along a rough path in a marshy waste opening between sandhills upon the sea. Of subject, in the ordinary sense of that term, the picture has none, but in its technical sense it has plenty of subject and beauty to boot. The painter has succeeded in representing the vapours of the waste suffused with sunlight, the exquisite harmony of the colours of its flowers and herbage, and the tender gradations of the atmosphere. Of this picture M. C. Giroux has made a large etching, for an impression of which we are indebted to the publishers of L'Art. To the same publishers and engraver we owe an impression of the companion plate after the picture by Mr. W. MacEwen called 'A Ghost Story,' and representing a company of spinsters who have stopped working while one of their number tells a legend the awfulness of which is well suggested by the expressions of their faces and attitudes. The picture, as such, owes its style and manner, its feeling for effect, and its method of treatment to the successes of M. Dagnan-Bouveret in dealing with the effect, tonality, and coloration of sunlit interiors when the windows are partly obscured by semi-transparent blinds. The composition is awkward; none of the figures is even comely, much less beautiful; but the expressions of the dull girls' faces and the heaviness of their bucolic wits are capitally given. As becomes the reputation of the artist, the print is very faithful, the tone carefully graded, and the rendering of the colour of its original is most competent. Not so fine and artistic as either of the above is M. A. Bahnet's large lithograph (likewise from L'Art) after a somewhat commonplace and pretentious landscape and figures by M. J. Cazin, called 'Ismaël.' As an illustration of the recent revival of lithography, a process formerly much more employed in Paris than at present, this print has an interest beyond the picture, which is in the Luxembourg, where, in old days, nothing so crude would have been admitted. Again from L'Art comes to us an impression from M. Deville's etching after 'Visite à l'Atelier,' a badly combined pair of ill-favoured damsels, apparently smartly dressed models. The taste of the painter, Mr. M. Elliot, is bad, and his types and technique are vulgar, while the coarseness of his execution extends to the light, tone, and coloration of his picture. Of these qualities M. Deville had to make the best he could. He has done better than might be expected, but the picture was not worthy of reproduction.

Mr. F. Shields has been exceptionally happy in preparing a thoroughly poetical and sympathetic illustration of Blake's charming lines beginning—

Little lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?

and we have to thank the Autotype Company for an impression—signed by the artist, and bearing for its remarque two lambs couchant—from their plate, which measures 13 in. by 17½ in. Two pretty children are in a meadow; one of them kneels before a very young lamb, and addresses the creature in the words of Blake. The taste and sympathy of the artist deserve the highest praise we can offer. The plate itself is highly successful, harmonious in all respects, simple, soft, and broad, and does justice to the tenderness and seriousness of the faces.

A large facsimile of a chalk drawing of the head, in the front view, of the late Master of Balliol, by Mr. M. Hanhart, comes to us from Messrs. W. H. Beynon & Co., of Cheltenham, and, although not a particularly animated or subtle rendering of a highly interesting head, it ought to be welcome to a host of our readers. As a lithograph it is very good indeed.—From Messrs. H. Graves & Co. we have "artist proof" impressions in photogravure after attractive landscapes by Mr. Douglas Adams of woodland scenery and sporting subjects, rabbit and pheasant shooting, selected from those which we recently commended with qualifications, and which are exhibited at the publishers' gallery in Pall Mall. The reproductions are, as such plates go, first rate, and deserve the attention of all lovers of English landscape. The pathos and beauty of the scenes are such that we would much rather have the pictures without the dying agonies of the birds and beasts.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

MESSRS. AONW's exhibition of water-colour drawings is quite as important and instructive as any of its twenty-seven forerunners. Among the pieces to which attention may especially be called are W. Hunt's brilliant, solid, and humour-filled pictures of genre, 'The Mid-Day Meal' (No. 12), 'A Warm Berth', a boy near an iron stove (271), and 'The Student' (262); his consummate power of delineating colour in flowers and fruit is displayed in 'Bullaces and Blackberries' (267), 'Plums and Greengages' (263), 'Roses and Bird's-Nest' (268), and 'Purple Grapes' (272). Copley Fielding's 'Plymouth Sound' (9) is exceptionally clear and solid. Sir J. D. Linton's 'Summer' (13) shows his fine draughtsmanship and rather stiff inspiration. 'La Ghirlandata' (45) of Rossetti is a monochrome version of an oil picture we have already described. 'The Garland' (50) of Sir E. B. Jones is far from being his best work. A perfectly characteristic pseudo-classic poem in colour and effect is the strong and bright 'Classical Composition' (135) of G. Barret. Sir J. Gilbert's 'Battle of the Boyne' (143) is a spectacular design, original, full of energy and movement, and rich in colour. Among the masterpieces of sincere, brilliant, solid, and fresh art are the 'Landscape with Horses' (145) and 'Calais Pier' (263), a silvery and limpid jewel, saturated with light, by D. Cox. 'On the Downs, near Lewes' (158), by Mr. H. G. Hine, is, as to its breadth and style, like an old master; like nature as to its poetry, and thoroughly fine as to its technique. Majestic and simple is the 'Newark Castle' of De Wint (226); and worthy of Turner in various ways are his 'Oberlahnstein' (293); 'Penmaen Mawr' (300), which was engraved in 'England and Wales'; the solid 'Corfe Castle' (301), of which there is an independent plate; 'Sallenches' (204); and 'Lausanne and the Lake of Geneva' (304). Besides these the collection comprises capital examples of S. Prout, Mr. S. P. Jackson, Mr. McWhirter, H. B. Willis, Sir F. Powell, Mr. G. A. Fripp, F. Walker, Mr. B. Foster, Sir J. E. Millais, J. Varley, R. P. Bonington, Mr. E. J. Poynter, and G. Chambers.

The hundred and sixteenth exhibition of the Fine-Art Society comprises a thoroughly spirited and ably drawn "Collection of Drawings, Political and Personal," by Mr. H. Furniss, which are more than three hundred and sixty in number. Mr. Furniss is a satirist, not sardonic, but for knaves, time-servers, political mountebanks, and especially for "old Parliamentary hands" of all sorts, he has hatred as unrelenting as it is manly and vigorous. Mr. Furniss is to be congratulated on the great improvement which has come over his taste since the last exhibition of his sketches, and because, while the edge of his satires has become keener, crudities and vulgarities have nearly disappeared from his designs, and he draws a very great deal better. Mr. E. J. Milliken has written a very sympathetic and sufficiently biographical "note" to the catalogue of these drawings.

Mr. Fulleylove is to be congratulated on the variety and vividness of his hundred water-colour drawings now collected in the rooms of the Fine-Art Society, and painted with exceptional spirit and sympathy to illustrate "Paris of To-day." Since Bonington and Girtin delineated a Paris so different from the present, no one has been better qualified by his taste to do so, or has displayed a more brilliant touch, a purer love for colour, a juster sense of light, and a firmer mode of draughtsmanship, than Mr. Fulleylove. Of the hundred and twenty exhibitions of the Society, none has been more attractive and artistic. We may especially mention 'The Allée des Orangers, Tuileries Gardens' (4), glowing in sunlight and radiant verdure; 'Luxembourg Gardens, The Fountain' (5); 'The Hôtel de Cluny' (15), a powerful piece of colour; 'The Terrace, St. Germain-en-Laye' (26), where silvery, yet warm light floods the scene; and 'The Garden of the King, Versailles' (53), which seems even now to retain the splendour of "Le Roi Soleil" himself. 'St. Etienne du Mont' (59) is first rate, while 'The Colonnade, Versailles' (83), is due to the best skill of the accomplished draughtsman.

SALE.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 23rd, 24th, and 26th ult. the following, from the Murrieta Collection. Drawings: F. J. Shields, One of your Broad Watchers, 99l. D. Cox, A Landscape, with cart-shed and peasants on a road, 54l. B. Foster, A Landscape, with children in a cart, watering cattle at a pond, 176l.; Blackberry Gatherers, 252l. L'Hermitte, A French Interior, with women spinning, 168l. Picture: Seymour Lucas, Town Gallants, 141l.

Five-Fit Cassy.

BESIDES the so-called Luiken picture, representing an old woman seated in a Dutch interior and sewing, now hanging on a screen in the Vestibule of the National Gallery, and numbered 1397, which we mentioned on the 3rd ult., and which, conjecturally, is ascribed to Jan Van Aach, a little-known artist of the later half of the seventeenth century, there has been placed at the back of the same screen, and numbered 1401, 'A Study of Still Life,' by Pieter Snyers, who was born 1593 and was living in 1669. It is painted in a broad, effective, and firm style, and with a rather heavy touch, and represents fowls hanging on a wall, artichokes, lobsters, apples and plums in a basket, a china bowl filled with cherries, and, resting on a grey woollen shawl, asparagus, radishes, peonies, and figs. Also in the Vestibule now hangs Terburg's 'Portrait of a Gentleman,' No. 1399, a most desirable addition to the gallery, which we mentioned last week. Almost facing the last is the sketch by Rembrandt, No. 1400, lately in Lady Eastlake's collection, which we have likewise described. It is a rough and rather confused but energetic piece, of no great consequence in a gallery which already contains many master-works of the artist. In Room XIV. have just been placed two portraits of ladies in the dresses of ladies' maids of the eighteenth century. They are the work of Henry Robert Morland, father of George Morland, the better-known painter of rustic subjects, and son of George Henry Morland, who, like himself, painted portraits, "fancy pieces," and themes of domestic genre. The new pictures are well known as the originals of two once very popular mezzotints by Philip Dawe, published by Carington Bowles in his numerous series of prints of a uniform size and by different engravers. One, if not both, was engraved twice. They were sometimes printed in thick colours with varnish upon glass, and respectively known as 'Lady's Maid Ironing' and 'Lady's Maid Washing.' They have been said to be portraits of the beautiful Misses Gunning, and with those titles, as No. 433 and No. 441, were included in the National Portrait Exhibition, 1867. These names are, chronology and the faces forbidding, quite wrong. It is probable that they are portraits of G. H. Morland's daughters, although Bromley ('Portraits,' Par. IX., Class IX., Second Subdivision) thought that the 'Lady's Maid Washing' was taken from Miss Dawe, the painter's sister. They are evidently from different models, with a family likeness, neither of them having a beautiful face, but the ironing girl is tolerably good-looking. Somewhat less than the size of life, the figures are half-lengths, and executed in a thin, hard, and laborious manner, with great brightness, polished surfaces, pale carnations, and thoroughly good modelling; because of the coldness and weakness of their colours, they do not attract so much at first sight as their simplicity and the comeliness of the expressions deserve. Both the girls wear low-cut bodices, and on their shoulders small fichus; their dresses are of cotton printed in flowers on white grounds. The effect of daylight is ably depicted, and the work is solid throughout. They were recently in Lord Mansfield's possession at Caen Wood, Highgate, and are now Nos. 1402 and 1403 in the national collection.

We are glad to hear that the Trustees have made Dr. Budge Keeper of the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities. Dr. Budge has endured so much persecution for the sake of the Museum that he well deserved a promotion to which his attainments as a scholar gave him every claim.

The private views of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours are appointed for Thursday and Friday next. The public will be admitted to the galleries on and after Saturday next.

At Easter the authorities of St. Paul's propose to remove the scaffolding in the choir of their cathedral, where Mr. W. B. Richmond has been decorating in glass mosaic the vault and part of the walls. The general design and character of the painter's works have been already set before our readers at some length. These ambitious and difficult enrichments are yet the most extensive and brilliant of their kind yet attempted in this country, and on the whole, in their way, the most successful. We have already described the iconography of the pictures. Next week we may have more to say about them.

BESIDES the locyths we have lately described as having been acquired by the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, British Museum, Mr. Murray has recently secured and exhibited in the Vase Gallery a highly interesting pyxis inscribed with a painter's name which was quite unknown till now. The utensil bears on the top in red, and upon the customary black ground, an arm in the act of holding a sword and scabbard, apparently copied from the device of a shield, the rim of which is delineated with red circles. It came from Tralles in Asia Minor, and dates from c. 450 B.C. Placed near this relic the student will find an elegant cylix, on which is drawn in black and red a youth sitting before a flaming altar and holding in his hands a lyre and a vessel for libations. The cylix is specially noteworthy because it was anciently mended with brass wire, as is still apparent. It is a little older than the pyxis, say c. 460 B.C.

MR. JOHN DURAND, who has translated some of the late M. Taine's works, is writing a biography of his father, who attained the high place of President of the American National Academy of Arts, being commonly regarded as the father of landscape painting in America.

MR. JOHN EDWARD TAYLOR, well known as the chief proprietor of the Manchester Guardian, has lately been making some munificent donations to the public galleries both of his own city and of London. Among the chief riches of his collection were an extensive series of works by the early English water-colour painters, and a set of engravings after Turner in choice and rare proof states. From the former series Mr. Taylor has just made a gift of about sixty examples to the South Kensington Museum, having already presented nearly twice as many to the Whitworth Institute at Manchester, while to the Print Room at the British Museum he has presented his unique collection, in six portfolios, of touched and other proofs of the 'England and Wales' series after Turner.

THE Royal Academy Exhibition will be closed next Saturday.

THE Society of Antiquaries has protested against the submersion of the island of Philæ, and the Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt spoke out on the same subject at its meeting last week. So it is hoped that this country will not be made an object of scorn to the civilized world by the perpetration of such an act of vandalism.

WHAT was probably the last incident in the history of Clement's Inn occurred on Friday of last week—the sale, for a very small sum, of an official seal of the inn, at Messrs. Robinson & Fisher's, Willis's Rooms.

MR. BATAFORD is going to publish a set of sixty-two plates of the London churches of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Mr. G. H. Birch will superintend the work and furnish the letterpress. Ground plans will be given, and examples of carving, brass work, plaster work, and other details. Year by year railway companies and the Bishop of London are diminishing the number of these interesting buildings, so that the book will soon have an historic interest.

NUMISMATIC works do not often run out of print; and it is a sign of an increasing interest in the subject that the second edition of 'Coins and Medals: their Place in History and Art,' by the British Museum specialists, edited by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole, should be already exhausted. A third edition is being prepared, to which Mr. E. J. Rapson, of the Department of Coins, will contribute an additional article on recent discoveries in the field of Indian numismatics.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Symphony Concerts.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
QUEEN'S HALL.—Philharmonic Society.

THE programme of Mr. Henschel's sixth Symphony Concert on Thursday last week was at once brief and well varied. Wagner was represented by the 'Tannhäuser' Overture and the Prelude to the third act of 'Die Meistersinger.' The symphony was Schumann's in D minor, which was vigorously played, though Mr. Henschel did not make sufficient allowance for the composer's imperfect grasp of orchestration, and permitted his brass to dominate the rest of the players. Mlle. Eibenschütz is invariably intelligent in whatever she attempts, and her rendering of Beethoven's Piano-forte Concerto in E flat, if insufficiently broad and masculine, was full of effective points. Brahms's impressive Rhapsody for contralto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, founded on lines from Goethe's 'Hartzeise in Winter,' was very expressively sung, as to the principal part, by Miss Marie Brema, and the tenors and basses in Mr. Henschel's choir were equal to their duties. The work has been described as dull and ungrateful to the singer, but evidently Miss Brema did not find it so, and such a description can only be the result of imperfect acquaintance with one of Brahms's most characteristic efforts. There was a misstatement in the book, Schumann's Symphony in C major being described as in C minor. Attention may be drawn to this curious error for correction on a future occasion.

The novelty at last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert was a Concertstück in G minor and major, for flute solo and orchestra, by Heinrich Hofmann, a composer of whom little has been heard of late. The piece consists of two movements, andante and allegro moderato, and is well laid out for solo display, though it cannot be regarded as higher than virtuoso music, in spite of excellent orchestration. The principal performer was Mr. Albert Francella, who displayed excellent command over his instrument. A brilliant performance of Chopin's Piano-forte Concerto in F minor, generally, though erroneously, known as No. 2, was given by Mlle. Eibenschütz, the original ineffective scoring being followed, as usual at Sydenham. The performance of Schubert's great Symphony in C, No. 9 (or No. 7 as it is called in Germany), was quite up to the average, which means that it was little short of perfect; and Brahms's fine Tragic Overture, Op. 81, was included in the programme. Mr. Ben Davies was entirely satisfactory in vocal selections by Weber and Arthur Somervell.

The acoustic properties of the new Queen's Hall were put to a further, and we may say final, test at the Philharmonic Concert on Wednesday evening, and the result was eminently satisfactory, the volume of tone in forte passages being magnificent without any unpleasant echo. The society cannot be blamed for shifting its quarters, and it would seem that musical amateurs are not displeased, the audience being very large. Further interest of a special, though rather sad, nature attached to the occasion by the performance of Tchaikowsky's last Symphony in B minor, No. 6, which, strangely, but appropriately, is entitled 'Symphonie Pathétique,' and is understood to have been completed very shortly before the Russian composer's death. In point of construction it is one of the most singular symphonies ever penned, and yet it could not be termed in the least rhapsodical or incoherent. The first movement is remarkable for the fact that the tempo changes no fewer than seven times, though in form it is fairly orthodox. The second section is an allegro con grazia in five-four measure, which the composer, with much ingenuity, makes appear quite natural and unlaboured. Then we have a brilliant allegro molto vivace, virtually a scherzo, worked up to an imposing climax in the style of a triumphant march. The precise idea which the composer meant to convey here is not clear, but death is evidently suggested in the final adagio lamentoso. This is the finest portion of the work, and the close, in which all the instruments save the cellos and basses (divided) are withdrawn, is truly pathetic. Though rugged in places, the symphony shows considerable power, and stamps Tchaikowsky as a tone poet. Its great difficulties were fairly overcome by the superb Philharmonic orchestra, and it was warmly, if not enthusiastically received. It is unnecessary to linger over the rest of the programme. Goldmark's picturesque 'Sakuntala' Overture was played for the first time at these concerts; Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a highly intelligent rendering of Beethoven's Piano-forte Concerto in E flat; and Miss Ella Russell was heard to advantage in Mendelssohn's scena 'Infelice,' this being the only vocal piece in the programme. Dr. Mackenzie conducted throughout with marked ability.

MADAME PATEY.

THE painfully sudden death at Sheffield of this widely esteemed vocalist came as a shock to musicians on Wednesday last, although a remarkably successful career was on the point of termination. Janet Monach Whytock was born in London, it is said, on May 1st, 1842, and in due course joined the Henry Leslie Choir. On one occasion, in 1864, the contralto artist of the evening was unable to appear, and Miss Whytock took her place, when the beauty of her voice was at once perceived; and three or four years later, after her marriage with Mr. J. G. Patey, she assumed the place vacated by Madame Sainton-Dolby as leading contralto in oratorio. Her subsequent career is too well known to need detailed reference. Madame Patey's voice was far superior in richness and power to that of her predecessor, but she was not a musician in the technical sense, that is to say, she could not attack a score and render justice to her part without rehearsal. But the faculty of reading at sight is as much a gift of nature as purely vocal equipment, and in regard to the latter Madame Patey was richly endowed. Lovers of oratorio will remember to the last the almost demonic force with which she gave Jezabel's recitative in the second part of 'Elijah,' and the fervour of religion she subsequently infused into 'O rest in the Lord.' In the contralto parts of many other sacred works she was also inimitable for many years. That a singer of such attainments should, like Malibran, die with the applause of the public ringing in her ears is an enviable distinction; but a pang of regret must be felt by those who anticipated the pleasure of listening to her once more in the course of the tour which it was understood would be a farewell to professional life.

Musical Society.

At the Royal College of Music concert on Thursday last week a new Piano-forte Quartet in D minor, by Mr. H. Walford Davies, was well performed by the composer and Messrs. Charles Jacoby, William Ackroyd, and Paul Ludwig.

It is an extremely clever work, the young composer's models being apparently Beethoven and Brahms. He could not select better for this class of composition. The best, or, at any rate, the most carefully thought-out movement is the last, elaborately described as "Largo (quasi-ciaccona), Molto allegro, returning to Ciaccona, Presto." The programme likewise contained, probably for the first time in London, the finale to an Organ Sonata in c minor, Op. 22, by Piutti, presumably an Italian composer, and a Trio in c minor for piano, oboe, and horn, by Reinecke, Op. 188.

FEMALE violinists have increased and multiplied of late, and it is now asserted that at the present moment the whole of the students of the violoncello at the Royal Academy of Music are ladies. This fact is sufficiently curious to be worthy of record.

THOUGH German opera is not in contemplation at Covent Garden this season, some performances of Wagner's later works may be given at Drury Lane under the direction of Sir Augustus Harris, with the co-operation of Herr Alvary.

THERE is little to be said this week respecting the Popular Concerts. Last Saturday the programme included Cherubini's fine Quartet in d minor and Beethoven's Sonata in A for piano and violin, Op. 30, No. 1. The pianist was Miss Fanny Davies, who was heard at her best in Schumann's 'Kreisleriana.' Madame Alice Gomez, the vocalist of the afternoon, was unusually indistinct in her enunciation. Without reference to the book it was impossible to say in what language she was singing.

ON Monday Bach's Concerto in d minor for two violins was played as superbly as ever by Lady Halle and Herr Joachim, and the orchestral accompaniments were rendered with the utmost skill on the pianoforte by Mr. Henry Bird. The subtle beauties of Beethoven's Sonata in c minor, Op. 111, were, perhaps, not fully realized by Mlle. Eibenschütz, but, on the whole, her performance was spirited and generally praiseworthy. A young soprano, Miss Dale, made a very favourable impression as the vocalist.

THE most interesting feature of the Royal Academy concert at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon was a Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin by Miss Llewella Davies (Macfarren scholar). This is a bright and fanciful work, not remarkably original nor powerful, perhaps, but written in musicianly style and extremely pleasing. It was well played by Miss Gertrude Collins and the composer. If Mr. George E. Mott, whose anthem "God is our hope" headed the programme, continues to write church music, he will do well to bear in mind the Scriptural injunction to "avoid vain repetitions of words." Among the vocal students by far the most promising was Miss Marion Evans, who sang Kjerulf's 'Sýnnova's Song' with charming taste.

WE are pleased to learn that it is proposed to publish in a limited edition the contents of the MS. known erroneously as 'Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book.' This is certainly one of the most valuable collections of the earliest works for keyed instruments written in England. The work is to be edited by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland and Mr. W. Barclay Squire, and will be issued in monthly parts. Subscriptions will be received by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel, 54, Great Marlborough Street.

SOME time since we announced that a series of twelve orchestral and choral concerts would be given under the conductorship of Mr. F. H. Cowen at the Queen's Hall. The enterprise has been delayed, but it is now definitely arranged, although the prospectus before us does not give the dates. Nine of the concerts are to be orchestral, with a professional band of eighty players, and three choral, for which a new choir is in course of formation. The prices will be much lower than those usually charged at high-class concerts.

WAGNER's 'Rienzi,' which has been neglected for several years, was announced for revival this week at Liverpool by the Carl Rosa Company, but the production of Tascas's remarkable opera 'A Santa Lucia' is postponed until the company's season at Manchester, which will commence on the 12th inst.

HERR GRIEG, who, it will be remembered, was unable to accept the invitation to Cambridge last year to receive the honorary degree of Doctor in Music, has now recovered his health, and has promised to attend on May 10th, and will conduct one of his own works at a concert of the University Musical Society.

ACCORDING to the Signale more than sixty new operas were produced in Germany last year, though about a third of them were small one-act works. Perhaps the most successful was Herr Humperdinck's 'Hänsel and Gretel,' which it is probable we shall hear in England in the course of the next few months.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

OPÉRA COMIQUE.—'The Heirs of Rabourdin,' a Play in Three Acts. Translated from Émile Zola by A. Teixeira de Mattos.

WHATEVER opinion may be entertained of the merits of M. Zola as a novelist, the most ardent disciple can scarcely claim for him a high position as a dramatist. Of the two most important gifts of the dramatist, humour and dramatic perception, he possesses scarcely a spark. In the preface to the printed version of 'Les Héritiers Rabourdin' he protests against the all but unanimous condemnation passed on him by the Parisian critics, saying, with a full sense of its significance and import, "Si tout ce qu'on a écrit sur les 'Héritiers Rabourdin' veut dire quelque chose, ce quelque chose est un congé formel, une menace de prendre des triques, le jour où j'aurais l'audace de récidiver." Even so, and M. Zola will do well to bury his anger, conceal his annoyance, and strike out from future editions of the play, if such should be demanded, the mournfully dull and inadequate proface. If ever there was an occasion on which a man of wit and spirit should have shown his capacity, it presented itself when M. Zola determined to answer his assailants. On one point of fact he triumphed. Not wholly without justification, the critics taxed him with obligation to previous writers. Criticism, he says, "m'a jeté à la figure des poignées de vaudevilles." He then avows that the first idea of his piece was taken from the 'Volpone' of Ben Jonson, a knowledge of whose writings exacts a species of erudition with which he is far from taxing his consors. This statement, obviously true, furnishes a fine weapon with which to belabour his critics. It supplies, however, the crowning proof of M. Zola's dramatic incapacity. Taking a play which held possession of the stage for close on two centuries, supplied two, if not three, test characters, and is still read with delight—a work no less dramatic in grip than scathing in satire, imaginative in conception, literary in style, in every sense a masterpiece—he has extracted from it a miserable and revolting picture of human infirmity, a work so sordid that the management of the Independent Theatre even might have hesitated to produce it. Concerning 'Volpone' Steele says in the Tatler, "Ben Jonson has made every one's passion in this play be towards money; and yet not one of them expresses that desire, or endeavours to obtain it, any way but what is peculiar to him only: one sacrifices his wife, another his profession, another his posterity, from the same motive; but their characters are kept so skilfully apart, that it seems prodigious their discourses should rise from the invention of the same author." Volpone boasts:—

I glory

More in the cunning purchase of my wealth
Than in the glad possession, since I gain
No common way; I use no trade, no venture;
I wound no earth with ploughshares, fat no beasts,
To feed the shambles; have no mills for iron,
Oil, corn or men, to grind them into powder:
I blow no subtle glass, expose no ships
To threatenings of the furrow-faced sea;
I turn no monies in the public bank
Nor sure private.

For this man (who, like Iago, ever makes his "fool" his "purse," and lives sumptuously and sensually on the gifts of those who hope to inherit from him) we have Rabourdin, an absolute pauper, accepting as nephew a youth who gives him a couple of ducks, grumbling at a niece who for many days past has sent him nothing more than a leg of mutton, and threatened with exposure because he cannot raise a few pounds—a creature who allows himself to be propped on pillows and poisoned with medicines by those only too anxious to kill him and inherit his imaginary savings. To do M. Zola justice, he owns that he dares not reproduce what is boldest and most imaginative in his model. His ambition does not extend beyond exhibiting pictures of human meanness, greed, and ferocity such as Balzac supplied in 'Les Paysans,' and M. Zola himself has given in 'La Terre.' In this task, even, he has failed, succeeding only in burlesquing a noble work, and showing the limitation in one direction of his powers. On the interpretation it is needless to dwell. It was a miracle of incompetence.

Julius Lemaitre: Impressions de Théâtre. Seventh Series. (Paris, Leclerc, Oudin & Co.)—The seventh series of the collected criticisms of M. Jules Lemaitre, carrying the theatrical record up to March last, is equally brilliant, clever, and paradoxical with any of its predecessors. It is difficult to be more amusing or more stimulating than is this delightful writer. His work is unequal, but it may be said that he is best when the subject with which he deals is most important. His well-known dislikes or prejudices are as assertive and as amusing as ever, and the perusal of his writings is generally a pleasure. The necessity of filling out a certain space weighs upon him, and his padding is not always satisfactory. He is too fond, moreover, of illustrations drawn from recent politicians, and too apt to let politics usurp the place of criticism. With these allowances he is equally just and delightful.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET.

From Original Sources.

By Sir WILLIAM MUIR, K.S.C.I.

"This biography is the fruit of untiring research on the part of a great Orientalist, and no more authoritative guide to the history of the prophet of Arabia could be desired."

In this, its latest form, Sir William Muir's book will long remain the standard English work on the subject. — Guardian.

"This edition, the third, will be welcome to every one interested in the history of Islam. The book has taken rank as one of the leading authorities on its subject, and will always remain one of the most valuable among English contributions to Oriental scholarship." — Spectator.

"In its present form Sir William Muir's book is more than ever welcome as a standard work at once complete and handy." — Home and Colonial Mail.

WHAT OUR DAUGHTERS CAN DO FOR THEMSELVES: a Handbook of Women's Employments. By Mrs. H. COLEMAN DAVIDSON, Author of 'Dainties, English and Foreign,' 'Eggs,' &c.

"Full of sensible advice and sound practical information for our daughters."

"A volume which every one who is at all interested in work for ladies should read."

"Handed in a succinct and businesslike way. The hints are marked by clearness, knowledge, and common sense." — Daily Telegraph.

"Mrs. Davidson is an authority on the subject of women's employments, and this useful handbook gives full and accurate information as to the cost of training for various employments, and offers suggestions which will be invaluable." — Manchester Guardian.

"An excellent little volume. Mrs. Coleman Davidson has done her work briefly but thoroughly, and her book contains a compact mass of information very clearly arranged."

Imperial folio, bound half-morocco extra, gilt edges, price 12s.

"We are glad to be able to say that in the new edition of Stanford's great 'London Atlas' many improvements have been introduced. The work ought to be a permanent monument to the enterprise of the house by which it is issued. The atlas as a whole is one of great practical utility. It is in many respects unique among English atlases. For those who use an atlas mainly to find where a place is, and who can afford the cost of the 'London Atlas,' we commend it."—Times, February 26, 1894.

THE 'YOUNG MAN' ON THE SWAN FOUNTAIN PEN.

2, AMEN CORNER, JANUARY 25, 1894.

Sirs,—I have been using a SWAN PEN for nearly three years, and although I have given it exceptionally hard work, it seems to me to write just as smoothly and comfortably as when I started.
 I NEVER WANT A BETTER PEN. For men who are constantly scribbling—as I am—the MABIE TODD PEN is indispensable. I simply could not go back to the old hard spluttering steel nib.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHICA:

A MAGAZINE OF BIBLIOGRAPHY.

IN TWELVE QUARTERLY PARTS.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO. beg to announce their intention of publishing a Quarterly Magazine of Bibliography in its historical and artistic aspects, of which the first number will be issued during the present month, and the last at the end of 1896.

They believe that an opportunity has now presented itself to give to the class of readers who have taken so great an interest in "Books about Books" a series of papers written by writers of authority, on various points of Book-lore which require special treatment, without being of sufficient importance to be made the subject of separate works. In order to combine the advantages of serial publication with finality and completeness, a somewhat novel departure has been taken in determining to publish the Magazine for only three years, the Publishers considering that in the course of twelve quarterly numbers the contributors will be enabled to write on most of the topics with which they are specially conversant, while purchasers will have a guarantee that in three years their sets will be complete.

The Magazine will contain papers on Manuscripts, Early Printed Books, the History of Book-Collecting and Libraries, Book-Prices and Book-Sales, Book-Illustrations, Book-Plates, Binding, and Early Printed Music.

Part I., which will be issued immediately, contains the following Articles:—

- A COPY of CELSUS from the LIBRARY of GROlier. W. Y. FLETCHER.
- CHRISTINA of SWEDEN and HER BOOKS. Charles I. ELTON.
- RAOUL LEFEVRE and 'Le RECUEIL des HISTOIRES de TROYE.' H. OSKAR SOMMER.
- NAMES and NOTES in BOOKS. ANDREW LANG.
- The ACCIPIES WOODCUT. R. PROCTOR.
- LA BIBLIOPHILIE MODERNE. OCTAVE UZANNE.
- THOINAN'S 'Les RELIEURS FRANÇAIS.' MISS PRIDEAUX.
- The STATIONERS at the SIGN of the TRINITY. E. GORDON DUFF.
- The BOOKS of HOURS of GEOFFROY TORY. ALFRED W. POLLARD.
- NOTICES:—1. Dr. Kristeller on Italian Printers' Marks.
- 2. Mr. Gosse's Catalogue and its Stevensoniana.

The following, among other Articles, will appear in early Numbers:—

A Series of Papers by Dr. E. MAUNDE THOMPSON on ENGLISH ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS—The ILLUSTRATED BOOKS of AUGSBURG and ULM, by Mr. WILLIAM MORRIS—SOME ENGRAVERS of ENGLISH BOOK-PLATES, by Mr. W. J. HARDY—The LIBRARY of FIELDING, by Mr. AUSTIN DOBSON—PEPYS as a BOOK-COLLECTOR, by Mr. H. B. WHEATLEY—The MENTZ PSALTER of 1457, by Mr. RUSSELL MARTINEAU—The CHRONOLOGY of the EARLY ALDINES, by Mr. R. C. CHRISTIE—A Study of The LIFE and WORKS of THOMAS FROGNALL DIBDIN, by Mr. J. P. EDMOND—and a History of ENGLISH PROVINCIAL PRESSES, by Mr. W. H. ALLNUTT.

Promises of help have also been received from Mr. S. J. ALDRICH, Mr. J. W. BRADLEY, Mr. A. H. BULLEN, Dr. COPINGER, Mr. CYRIL DAVENPORT, Mr. FAIRFAX MURRAY, Mr. FULLER MAITLAND, Dr. GARNETT, Mr. R. E. GRAVES, Mr. WALTER HAMILTON, Mr. H. P. HORNE, Mr. LAURENCE HOUSMAN, Mr. F. JENKINSON, Dr. PAUL KRISTELLER, the Rev. W. D. MACRAY, Mr. F. MADAN, Mr. G. R. REDGRAVE, Mr. W. ROBERTS, Mr. J. H. SLATER, Mr. W. B. SQUIRE, Mr. H. R. TEDDER, Mr. G. F. WARNER, Mr. W. J. WEALE, and other distinguished Writers.

A special feature in the Magazine will be the admission of articles in French as well as English. The Publishers have already secured the co-operation of M. Octave Uzanne, M. Henri Béraldi, and Mlle. Pellechet, and arrangements are being made with other foreign writers and specialists.

Each number of the Magazine will contain, besides cuts in the text, several Full-Page Illustrations reproduced by the best possible processes. The letterpress will be printed by Messrs. Constable, on hand-made paper, with Initial Letters and Tail-Pieces specially designed by Mr. Laurence Housman. The size will be Large Imperial Octavo, and there will be 128 pages in each number.

The Publishers are aware that the number of readers to whom such a Magazine will appeal, though slowly increasing, is still not large. As they are determined to produce each Part with all possible beauty of form, they are compelled to fix the annual subscription (Four Numbers) at Thirty Shillings. The price for Single Numbers, in order to prevent sets being broken into, has been fixed at Ten Shillings, net.

THE BEAUTY of BOSCASTLE. By T. MULLETT ELLIS. 5s.

The Scene is laid at Boscastle, Monte Carlo, Venice, Switzerland, Boscastle again.

"A powerful and fearless piece of work. It holds the reader, for it is written with so much nerve and go, and its setting is so wild and so vividly painted."—Daily Chronicle. "The book has some strong scenes and good word pictures of the Cornish coast."—Morning Post. "Mr. Mullett Ellis can write. There is not a dull page in the story."—Scotsman. "Much fertility of expression and a certain picturesqueness. The book is not without power or the faculty of imagination, and the final catastrophe of the shipwreck is well described."—Manchester Guardian. "Full of thrilling interest. We recommend our readers to obtain it."—Flycatcher. "The author shows an intimate acquaintance with the neighbourhood. The interest throughout is ably sustained, and there are some really fine pieces of descriptive writing."—Lancashire Weekly. "Mr. Ellis knows well how to tell a story."—Pastiches' Circular. "The author is a person of lively imagination, quick observation, and no inconsiderable erudition; gifted, moreover, with the knack of felicitous description. The 'Beauty of Boscastle' is a strong story. It abounds in clever characterizations, deftly fitted to the requirements of a singularly ingenious and intricate plot, the interest of which is steadily maintained from the romantic opening of the narrative to its tragical close."—Daily Telegraph.

TENNYSON'S IDYLLS OF THE KING

AND

ARTHURIAN STORY FROM THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

By M. W. MACCALLUM, M.A.,

Professor of Modern Literature in the University of Sydney.

TIME'S.—"The history of a great legend and its literary fruits has seldom been written more conscientiously and learnedly.... Professor MacCallum first traces the legend from Celtic sources—here he follows Professor Rhys and Mr. Nutt—down to its crystallization in Malory. Next he reviews all the literature, both British and foreign, which it has inspired, from Malory to Tennyson. All this leads up to a critical and appreciative analysis of Tennyson's treatment of the legend."

GLASGOW HERALD.—"A very notable book, which deals in a thoroughly scholarly way with 'the matter of Britain' and in an exhaustive way with the literary treatment of it, British and foreign, which is deeply interesting from first to last, and full of eminently sane criticism expressed in a crisp and workmanlike style.... We cannot leave this book without testifying to its rare literary merit, its comprehensiveness, and its masterly treatment of the whole subject."

THE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

THE GIFFORD LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREWS FOR 1890-1892.

By EDWARD CAIRD, M.A. Oxon. LL.D. D.C.L.,

Master of Balliol College, Oxford; Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow.

MIND.—"We believe it would be difficult to over estimate the importance of this book. It may serve, as no English book has yet served, to mediate between philosophy and life."
TIME'S.—"These learned and thoughtful volumes are a very important and very striking contribution to the philosophy of religious thought."
ACADEMY.—"The most valuable contribution made to speculative theology for many years past."

2 vols. demy 8vo. 32s.

The CRITICAL PHILOSOPHY of IMMANUEL KANT. By EDWARD CAIRD.

TWO GREAT SCOTSMEN—The BROTHERS WILLIAM and JOHN HUNTER. By GEORGE R. MATHER, M.D. F.F.P.S.G.

"Two Great Scotsmen" is in every respect worthy of its theme and purpose. Dr. Mather's biography, while minute and faithful in regard to the Hunters' antecedents, deals fully with their professional careers. To the other merits of the volume must be added those of beautiful type and artistic plates."—Times.

"Dr. Mather's book is full of half-forgotten facts and interesting details.... There are a number of photogravure illustrations in the volume, and in other respects it presents an attractive appearance."—Speaker.

THE LETTERS OF HARRIET COUNTESS GRANVILLE,
1810-1845.

Edited by her Son, the Hon. F. LEVESON GOWER.

"There are a number of pretty stories.....The writer shows herself on every page not only a most fond mother, but a most womanly woman, full of native shrewdness, and knowing more than she says. This will be one of the great books of the season."—Daily Chronicle.

"This most delightful and most discursive letter-writer.....All kinds of figures appear; not only great people like George IV. and the Duke of Wellington, and the Duke de Broglie and Lord Brougham—to say nothing of Queen Victoria herself—but a wonderful variety of lesser lights, men and women who were for the most part the social rage, or who had done something to amuse or shock, irritate or excite, inflame or depress, the circle in which they moved."—Daily Telegraph.

THREE NEW HISTORICAL NOVELS.

TWENTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

MONTEZUMA'S DAUGHTER. By H. RIDER HAGGARD, Author of 'She,'

'Allan Quatermain,' &c. With 24 Full-Page Illustrations by Maurice Greiffenhagen. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"'Montezuma's Daughter' is, on the whole, better than anything Mr. Haggard has accomplished since 'Jesse.'"—Times.

"Mr. Haggard has rarely done anything better than this romantic and interesting narrative. Throughout the story we are hurried from one thrilling experience to another, and the whole book is written at a level of sustained passion which gives it a very absorbing hold on our imagination."—Daily Telegraph.

TWENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

The REFUGEES: a Tale of Two Continents. By A. CONAN DOYLE, Author of

'Misch Clarke,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"A wonderfully racy, bright, enthralling story."—National Review.

"Outside the pages of 'Monte Cristo' there never were such half-breath escapes or such marvellous coincidences."—Athenæum.

"A masterly work.....It is not every year, or even every decade, which produces one historical novel of such quality as this story."—Spectator.

TWELFTH THOUSAND.

A GENTLEMAN of FRANCE: being the Memoirs of Gaston de Bonne, Sieur de Marsac. By STANLEY J. WEYMAN, Author of 'The House of the Wolf.' Crown 8vo. 6s.

"In many respects this book is so noteworthy that it places Mr. Weyman at once stride in the front rank of living novelists.....The valour of the man, his adroit skill and cool nerve in swordsmanship, his delicate consideration and gentle patience with his rebellious and wayward charge, his superb common sense in moments of supreme difficulty, and his rare devotion and self-sacrifice, render Gaston de Marsac, grizzled veteran though he is, an ideal knight, and one who is worthy of the most romantic days of chivalry."—Spectator.

DISCOVERY of LAKES RUDOLF and STEFANIE: an Account of Count SAMUEL TELEKI'S Exploring and Hunting Expedition in Eastern Equatorial Africa in 1891 and 1894. By his companion, Lieut. LUDWIG VON HOHNEL. With 126 Illustrations and 6 Maps. 2 vols. 8vo. 42s.

"Sport, discovery, and science contribute in this narrative to form a book of surpassing interest."—Spectator.

A SECOND EDITION of Mrs. LYNN LINTON'S Novel, 'The ONE TOO MANY,' is now ready, in 3 vols., at every Library.

"Some of Mrs. Linton's best writing is to be found in these volumes, and that is saying a great deal; for she is always vivid, trenchant, and picturesque."—Glasgow Herald.

"From the first moment we meet Elle, she commands our attention and enlists our sympathy. The book is splendidly written, and effective in every line."—Daily Chronicle.

"The whole book teems with brilliant epigram and sagacious apophthegm. In many respects, as a matter of fact, 'The One Too Many' is fully entitled to rank among the most powerful and remarkable novels of the day."—Daily Telegraph.

NEW LIBRARY NOVELS.

By George Manville Fenn.—The TIGER LILY: a Tale of Two Passions. 2 vols.

"Mr. Manville Fenn is an accomplished story-teller, and he is admirable throughout this book. The narrative, strong as is its subject, is always lightly handled, and the story will be read straight through by every one who takes it up."—Scotsman.

By John Hill.—The COMMON ANCESTOR. 3 vols.

"The story is so delightful that we should not have cared had it been no story at all. It is full of humour of the kindly sort, of shrewdness, and of admirable characterization. It is a novel to be read with true pleasure."—World.

By Christie Murray.—IN DIREST PERIL. 3 vols.

"In Direst Peril is a novel of rapid action and lively adventure, and its culminating incident is a novelty in fiction. The invention is clever, and the tale is skilfully told."—Scotsman.

A FAIR COLONIST. By ERNEST GLANVILLE. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.

"Mr. Glanville's latest story is as exciting as anything of Rider Haggard's. His weird witch-man is a genuine creation. Indeed, the witch man and African birds and beasts are so interestingly delineated that the reader, like Oliver Twist, 'asks for more.'"—Idler.

The QUEEN AGAINST OWEN. By ALLEN UPWARD. With a Frontispiece by J. S. Crompton.

"Of its kind 'The Queen against Owen' is a very good tale, and Mr. Allen Upward is to be congratulated on a novel manner of writing. The mystery is a good one—well concealed to the end; and the writing is generally amusing and clever. We have gained refreshment and amusement from this story."—Westminster Gazette.

LARGE-PAPER COPIES OF CERTAIN PUBLICATIONS.

The Large-Paper Copies of some of D. Nutt's Publications have not been all subscribed for. The copies at present unsold are now offered, for the last time, to the book-loving public during the space of six months from the date of the present advertisement. At the end of that period any copies still remaining unsold, saving two of each work, will be destroyed. It has always been the Publisher's endeavour to bring out his Large-Paper issues in as sumptuous and beautiful a form and at as low a price as possible, and not to print too many copies. If a miscalculation is made in the latter respect it is only fair to those who do purchase that their copies should be protected against possible depreciation, and this can only be done by destroying any large unsold stock. The prices are all strictly net.

PUNCH.

The First Volume is now published, with a fine Portrait of F. C. BURNAND as Frontispiece. Containing an exhaustive Index, giving, for the first time, the Names of all the Artists and indicating the year of Publication of each of the Pictures.

Price SIX SHILLINGS.

SOME PRESS NOTICES.

"There are many old friends in the first volume of 'Pictures from Punch,' which is issued with a capital portrait of Mr. F. C. Burnand to serve as frontispiece to a collection of some of the most graphic illustrations that have appeared in our time-honoured contemporary. There is no chronological arrangement in the book, so that side by side one may see the fascinating humour of John Leech and the latest pencillings of J. B. Partridge, the social studies of George Du Maurier and the graceful fancies of Linley Sambourne, the statuesque designs of Sir John Tenniel and the sporting studies of Messrs. Cleaver, Corbould, and Caldecott. Above all, this first instalment of what will no doubt prove a delightful series is rich in the contributions of that wayward but unmitigable genius, Charles Keene, who has left hardly any successor in his felicitous sketches of the ways and manners of the people."—Daily Telegraph.

"As good wine needs no bush, so these pictures need no commendation. Both style and signature indicate at a glance the name of the artist. The book contains some of the best illustrations in Punch, and the collection is well calculated to entertain the reader, especially after glancing over 'Just a few words' given by way of introduction. The portrait of Mr. F. C. Burnand appears as the frontispiece of this attractive volume."—Yorkshire Post.

"The first volume of 'Pictures from Punch' is so good, that we are at once inclined to ask for more. Looking through these two hundred and odd pages is like renewing acquaintance with old friends who, although not likely to be forgotten, had passed out of sight. For, as Mr. Burnand says in his neatly-worded introduction, 'Not for one moment can there be any hesitation in the mind of the student of Mr. Punch's volumes as to the work of his two imitable "Johannes"—John Leech and Sir John Tenniel—and, without reference to the index, who is there with anything like a knowledge of Mr. Punch's old and young masters, that will not be able at once, and with certainty, to say, 'This is a Du Maurier,' 'That is a Keene,' 'There is a Sambourne,' 'Here is a Partridge,' 'A Reed undoubtedly,' and so on, with the work of Messrs. Cleaver, Corbould, and other well-known names?' And so the goodly array of long-buried treasures is laid open to the public, and the public, if we mistake not, will gladly hurry up to the show."—Birmingham Post.

"Mr. Punch has given us the first instalment of his pictures from his pages in a handsomely bound volume. The book would be an ornament to any drawing-room table or well-stocked library. We agree with the editor of Punch that this volume is a most interesting record of the times, especially in its relation to the history of fashion both of ladies and of men. Dress in all its varieties during the last half century is exhibited. From cover to cover the first volume of 'Pictures from Punch' contains nothing to offend the eye or the ear of the most scrupulous of readers. It is the initial number of a series of books that can never be too long, when it is conducted on the present lines of good feeling and good sense."—Sunday Times.

TIMES.—"These two volumes constitute a very important and authoritative history of our relations in recent times with the two great Powers of the farther East."

STANDARD.—"A work of the highest interest and value."

SOCIAL EVOLUTION. By Benjamin Kidd. 8vo. 10s. net.

SPECTATOR.—"We do not often devote a leader to a book, but we have an impression that Mr. Benjamin Kidd's book, 'Social Evolution,' may have wide political as well as social effects. At all events, it marks a turning-point in the social controversy which is raging all around us.... This is an inadequate synopsis of a remarkable book, for Mr. Kidd—we have not a notion what he is, or who he is—supports every proposition with a mass of evidence."

TIMES.—"The name of Mr. Benjamin Kidd, author of a very striking work on Social Evolution, is, so far as we know, new to the literary world; but it is not often that a new and unknown writer makes his first appearance with a work so novel in conception, so fertile in suggestion, and on the whole so powerful in exposition as 'Social Evolution' appears to us to be.... 'Social Evolution' is a book which no serious thinker should neglect, and no reader can study without recognizing it as the work of a singularly penetrating and original mind."

NATURE.—"Taken altogether, we have only congratulation to offer to Dr. Gamgee on the production of this work." GLASGOW MEDICAL JOURNAL.—"We commend the book, not only to those who are specially engaged in physiological research or teaching, but also to the large and increasing body of practitioners who, from their education, are able to follow the more advanced scientific results. This book has the merit, not merely of stating the known facts, but of describing how these results have been obtained."

EDINBURGH MEDICAL JOURNAL.—"Undoubtedly the best and most exhaustive treatise on the subject."

Letters of Harriet, Countess Granville, 1810-1845. Edited by the Hon. F. Leveson-Gower. 2 vols. (Longmans & Co.)

CLOSE upon the publication of the correspondence of Joseph Jekyll appear the letters of Lady Granville. The two books partly cover the same ground, but the interest of the second is altogether superior. The daughter of the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire, and the wife of a distinguished diplomatist, Lady Granville naturally played a conspicuous part in the society both of London and Paris. She evidently took the keenest interest in the topics and personages of the hour, and yet zealously fulfilled her duties towards her husband and children, and, as many passages in these volumes assert, remained a sincerely religious woman. It is the union of the natural with the artificial that constitutes, perhaps, the most pleasing feature in her communications with her brother the Duke of Devonshire, her sister Lady Carlisle, and her other correspondents. We need only add that Mr. Leveson-Gower has acquitted himself respectably as editor; his notes are sufficient, and yet they are never obtrusive.

The early married life of Lord and Lady Granville was passed in England, and she gives amusing descriptions of their visits to country houses. Thus of Trentham she writes:—

"We fared sumptuously at the rich man's table. Our reception has really been ridiculous, but you shall judge. The dinner for us two was soup, fish, fricassée of chicken, cutlets, venison, veal, hare, vegetables of all kinds, tart, melon, pineapple, grapes, peaches, nectarines, with wine in proportion. Six servants to wait upon us, whom we did not dare dispense with, a gentleman-in-waiting and a fat old house-keeper hovering round the door to listen, I suppose, if we should chance to express a wish. Before this sumptuous repast was well digested, about four hours later, the doors opened, and in was pushed a supper in the same proportion, in itself enough to have fed me for a week. I did not know whether to laugh or cry."

And here is an account of a party at Castle Howard:—

"To make the scene present to you, I will give you a sketch of us at dinner. Lord Carlisle, star-shining, lip-projecting, with a dish of his own, a sort of solid soup, by his side, which he offers to a chosen few. Next to him G. looking amiable and resigned, and very pretty. Lady Julia Howard by her side with a wreath of white roses, more rouge than ever and innumerable jewels. Granville, looking very good-tempered, between her and Lady Carlisle with a camellia japonica and a red pink in her cap, trying, like the busy bee, to extract conversation from us all by nodding and staring at us. Doctor Jones by her side, fat, pale, and looking rather frightened when we ask him what weather we shall have, if it is unusually hot for this time of year, lest his answer may not agree with Lord C.'s sensations. Lord Morpeth, George Forth, and I are too insignificant to be mentioned but as background. Harry Howard is à la décamp at the joints of meat and never by any chance opens his lips."

Lady Caroline Lamb's infatuation for Byron was, of course, on everybody's lips in the year 1812, and Lady Granville records that

"Lord Byron is still upon a pedestal and Caroline William doing homage.....He is agreeable, but I feel no wish for any further intimacy. His countenance is fine when it is in repose, but the moment it is in play, suspicious, malignant, and consequently repulsive. His manner is either remarkably gracious and conciliatory, with a tinge of affectation, or irritable and impetuous, and then I am afraid perfectly natural."

Lady Granville, in company with Madame d'Arblay and Miss Fanny Kemble, was struck by Lady Caroline's extraordinary behaviour when, on the conclusion of the peace, English people flocked over to Paris:

"Nothing is agissant but Caroline William in a purple riding habit, tormenting everybody, but I am convinced ready primed for an attack upon the Duke of Wellington, and I have no doubt but that she will to a certain extent succeed, as no dose of flattery is too strong for him to swallow or her to administer. Poor William hides in one small room, while she assembles lovers and tradespeople in another. He looks worn to the bone. She arrived dying by her own account, having had French apothecaries at most of the towns through which she passed. She sent here immediately for a doctor, but by mistake they went for the Duke of Wellington."

And here is some scandal, not about Queen Elizabeth, but Madame de Staël:—

"Madame de Staël continues, I fear, in a dying state, but she gives dinners, and is as agissante as ever. She received me one morning last week very kindly. She sits in an armchair with the Duchesse de Broglie, very thin and pretty, Benjamin Constant, and a Miss —. This Miss —, whom Doctor Streeter with reason calls 'a most peculiar crater,' lives always with her, an immense, fierce-looking girl, with a head of straight black hair, all standing on end. Madame de Staël was very eloquent and touching on illness and death, very absurd on amitié and Miss —. 'Voici un trait frappant du pouvoir de l'amitié.' Miss — 'me porte d'une chambre à l'autre avec la même facilité qu'on porterait un enfant.' This trait analysed is that Miss is like a grenadier in petticoats, and poor Madame de Staël can hardly weigh an ounce. This Miss — narrowly escaped being hanged for forgery. She was the daughter of a clergyman, and forged two bills to the amount of 500*l.* each. How she got acquainted with Madame de Staël I do not know. Lady Morley knew her, and was distressed what countenance to make, but as Miss was not, she got over it."

The divorce proceedings against Queen Caroline were, it is hardly necessary to remark, a subject of copious correspondence, and Lady Granville tells the following excellent anecdote:—

"It seems that the man employed in looking after the Italian witnesses is a dandy. He went to them after Denman's speech, and as he entered, selon l'usage des dandies, settled his cravat, pulling it up and running his fingers along the bottom of his chin between his throat and the top of the neck-handkerchief. The Italians, aware of summary proceedings but not of the niceties of dress, understood this as a significant gesticulation to intimate to them that their throats were to be cut. They set up a horrid yell and plumped down on their knees, crying 'Misericordia!'"

For a person of spotless virtue Lady Granville was, according to modern ideas, curiously tolerant towards the liaison between George IV. and Lady Conyngham, and she thoroughly enjoyed a visit to the Pavilion at Brighton:—

"I went after it [the service on Christmas Day] to Lady Conyngham, and saw her Christmas gifts, which made my mouth water, and made me almost wish for a situation. A magnificent cross, seized from the expiring body of a murdered bishop in the island of Scio. An almanack, gold with flowers embossed on it of precious stones. A gold melon, which upon being touched by a spring falls into compartments like the quarters of an orange, each containing different perfumes."

This reminiscence of the Queen's childhood is hardly complimentary:—

"I have almost forgot to talk of my royal morning. I spent two hours at Cleveland House with the Duchess of Gloucester, an amiable and good soul, who talks of Trimmer and Mr. Dodson; the Duchess of Clarence, ugly with a good tournure and manner; the Duchess of Kent, very pleasing indeed and raving of her baby. 'C'est mon bonheur, mes délices, mon existence. C'est l'image du feu roi.' Think of the baby. They say it is le Roi George in petticoats, so fat it can scarcely waddle. Augusta, good-humoured and jolly, stuffing filets de sole and veal cutlets, and Sophia very clever and agreeable. I had to go with each of them the usual course. 'How many children has Lady Georgiana Morpeth?' 'Eleven, ma'am.' 'God bless my soul, you don't say so, it seems but yesterday,' etc."

Lady Granville had the faculty of hitting off a character in a few words, as witnesses a sketch of Sir Frederick Lamb, afterwards Lord Beaumont, which, however, she tones down on the following page:—

"I admire F. Lamb perhaps more than I like him. I think him uncommonly agreeable and clever, but he sees life in the most degrading light, and he simplifies the thing by thinking all men rogues and all women —. He looks old and world-beaten, but still handsome. He seems to enjoy being here, and sport, food, and sleep fill up his time. At any spare moment he reads the 'Heart of Midlothian,' of which he says: 'Why, if you wish for my opinion, I think it the worst novel I ever read.'"

We also read a good deal about Holland House, but the gossip concerning Lady Holland is perhaps less interesting than one might expect; however, an anecdote about the future Lady Palmerston—the "beau" can be easily guessed—fully makes amends:—

"Think of Lady Cowper overhearing a conversation between Rogers and Luttrell, herself the theme. She had converted her dressing-room into a bedroom for the former. Rogers was saved by the weakness of his lungs, Luttrell by the honesty of his friendship. She never heard Rogers' attacks, but that they were such she knows by the replies, all on the defensive. 'Upon my honour, I cannot judge her so harshly, she is so unaffected, so good-tempered.' 'Oh, come, come, women will have their beaux.' 'Well, I really don't know, but I have loved her from a child.'

It is unnecessary to dwell upon Lady Granville's experiences as the wife of the Ambassador at the Hague; enough that she extracted a lively commentary even from a Dutch Court. At the end of 1824 her husband was promoted to Paris, and at first she did not altogether appreciate the change:—

"At my ball I heard that when the French people came up to a quadrille, they turned from it with disgust if there were any English. 'Ah, mon Dieu, il y a des Anglaises.' The fact is that the butter is spread upon a fonds of hatred and jealousy towards nous autres, and then we meet it with an undue degree of hauteur and coldness. I do not mean me. They are really in general civil and so am I, but it is in spite of our teeth."

However, she soon became thoroughly contented, and could retail with gusto the proceedings of her friends abroad—Lady Jersey, for instance:—

"She was going a junket with Madame de Bourke and Lord John Russell. The Bourke at the moment of departure excused herself. Then comes great agitation, a positive declaration of the impossibility of going alone in a carriage with le cadet Russell, and finally an entreaty to Alava to go as chaperon. All she got, as he told me himself with shouts of laughter. 'Diable, vous devez être peu sûre de vous, si vous craignez rester seule avec le petit Lor' Jan.' She has delayed her departure till Monday, but as she is quite pacified I am in no hurry."

Also she writes of the Duchess of Hamilton:—

"The Duke and Duchess of Hamilton are arriving, she having had an ague and in a bad state of health. She has made herself talked of about Brownlow North. 'Il n'en valait pas la peine.' Nobody thinks harm of it, but he is toad intine, shawl-bearer, music-stand, takes the child in and out of the spectacles and calls the carriage. All that makes Lady Bath say, 'I don't believe it, but'—and Lady Westmorland, 'If she was anybody else.'"

One of the aptest passages in her letters concerns one of the supposed originals of Thackeray's Lord Steyne and Disraeli's Marquis of Monmouth:—

"Lord Yarmouth has taken to good company and appears at the drums and balls. He is the greatest pity that ever was. Such powers of being delightful and captivating, grandes manières, talents of all kinds, finesse d'esprit, all spent in small base coin. He walks amongst us like a fallen angel, higher and lower than all of us put together."

Lord Granville resigned his appointment when the Canningites retired from the Duke of Wellington's Government; accordingly his countess studied the approach of the Reform crisis on this side of the Channel. However, she appears to have taken nearly as much interest in the courtship of Lady Emily Cowper by the future Lord Shaftesbury, which seems to have been a somewhat halting affair. When Lord Grey's administration was formed, the Granvilles returned to Paris, and we have an animated account of a debate in the Chamber:—

"Sister, the reason I did not write was that I attended the Chambers all day. Odillon [sic] Barrot speaks incomparably well; he has a fine determined countenance, a fine voice and sublimquant manner set in a vulgar frame. Benjamin Delessert looks like an excellent English farmer, a Frank Lawley grown immensely large; La Fayette has par excellence the manner, tone, and voice of la bonne compagnie, leans on the bord and speaks to the Deputies as we should say, 'Were you at the Opera last night, Mr. Such-a-one?' Sebastiani spoke uncommonly well; his voice as clear as a bell, and the solemnity of his manner is not amiss in his ministerial attitude. The compliment to England was most warmly and strongly articulated. The Loi Electorale was debated with all the childish, noisy, petulant vehemence still reigning in their debates. They run, they ring, they squabble, they scold; and if such a thing you like to behold, you must come, Lady C., and, like Betty and me, sit up in a charming tribune, where one is in perfect comfort, like in a box at the Opera."

Talleyrand, in his latter days, appeared to Lady Granville in a pleasing light:—

"Did I tell you Talleyrand paid me a long visit on Wednesday morning? I never knew before that, as Mr. Foster says, power of his charms. First of all it is difficult and painful to believe that he is not the very best man in the world, so gentle, so kind, so simple, and so grand. One forgets the past life, the present look. I could have sat hours listening to him. He raves of the Queen here, and she is admirable. I am certain nothing will persuade him to remain here, or to give up London, and indeed what a position to quit, and what a position to gain!"

Talleyrand's adoration of the Queen of the French was shared by the ambassadress. Otherwise she held the Court rather cheap, and was forcibly impressed by the insecurity of Louis Philippe's position. Here is a ludicrous touch describing Sir Robert Peel in the presence of royalty:—

"We all dined at Neuilly the day before yesterday. Sir Robert can scarcely speak any French. The King talked English to him, but what was distressing, the Queen, under a natural embrouillement that being deaf to the language was the same as being deaf to the sound, bawled out every word to him as if he was stone deaf, loud and distinct. 'J'es—père que vous—vous plai—sez—à—Pa—ris.' An odd effect, and made Sir Robert fidget on his perch next to her at dinner."

But the protagonist of the second volume is distinctly Madame de Lieven, with whom Lady Granville contrived to keep on excellent terms. The following scene, wherein the Russian politician and Lady Holland figured, must have been highly humorous:—

"Madame de Lieven and she are great friends. 'Ma chère, j'étais chez elle. Il y avait Mme. Durazzo, Molé, Humboldt. On annonce Pasquier. Elle a l'air tout charmé, tout flatté. Elle me dit: 'Restez, je vous supplie; causer avec le Chancelier.' Je résiste; elle m'implore de ne pas l'abandonner. Je cède. Pas plutôt assise avec tout cet entourage qui nous regarde, qu'elle laisse tomber son sac. Elle me tape sur l'épaule: 'Pick it up, my dear; pick it up'—et moi, tout étonnée on bonne bête, me plongeant sur le tapis pour ramasser ses chiffons.' Is not this a true and incomparable Hollyism, taking out of Lieven's mouth the taste of the little flutter at the visits and besoin of her support, by treating her like Antonio, and showing off, what I believe never was seen before, Mme. de Lieven as a humble companion?"

We had marked many other passages for quotation, notably some capital descriptions of Lord Brougham on that jaunt to Paris when, as readers of the Greville memoirs will remember, his excruciating French set every one's teeth on edge. It would be unfair, however, to discount further the interest of a book that will, we hope, be widely and enthusiastically read. Perhaps the last two hundred pages or so are less absorbing than their predecessors, since Lady Granville is a trifle disappointing in what she writes about the Syrian crisis, when her husband contributed largely to the maintenance of peace, and she was afterwards oppressed by his illness. Still, we can only conclude as we began, by saying that these volumes are most delightful.

Chinese Central Asia. By Henry Lansdell, D.D. (Sampson Low & Co.)

DR. LANDELL is an enthusiast, and his two previous journeys shed something of a new light on life in Siberia, a theme which has not always secured thoroughly unbiassed treatment. The present work is intended as a companion and complement to his former book, 'Russian Central Asia,' but no doubt it is due to the fact of much of the descriptive matter having already appeared in various magazines, as well as to the number of travellers who have visited Chinese Turkistan during the last twenty years, that the present volume somehow lacks freshness. Much of the letterpress reads like long extracts from the Yarkand Mission reports of Sir Douglas Foreyth and his colleagues and the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society; and as the author adhered pretty closely to the beaten track there is not much that is new from a political or geographical point of view. The main object of the expedition was to spy out the land for missionary purposes, though even in this respect more might apparently have been done to ensure success. It is only fair, however, to give the author's explanation:—

"If the lover of missionary information should think that I did little or no work of a missionary kind myself, I would remind him that as a preacher I was dumb, as a distributor of literature I had not the proper translations, whilst as a pioneer I conceived it my chief task to observe what openings existed or could be made for qualified evangelists to follow."

Judging from the narrative, such openings do not appear to be numerous or promising, and in any case we fear that ordinary evangelists would meet with but indifferent success where Dr. Lansdell, with all the prestige of three or four hundred introductions and plenty of money at his back, was unable to achieve more.

Nevertheless, we light here and there on significant and interesting notes on the country traversed. For instance, "Merv, the Queen of the World," has, as we know, passed through strange dispensations of fate, but we are not sure that its latest renaissance, through the vivifying agency of the Trans-Caspian Railway, is an unmixed blessing. Dr. Lansdell remarks:—

"I was much struck with the large number of drinking places, the stock-in-trade of the distilleries, brandy, beer and wine shops being more than double that of all the grocers, pastrycooks, bakers, butchers, and vendors of lemonade."

The author crossed the Oxus river by the longest bridge in Asia (6,320 ft.), the far end of the structure being often out of sight when the traveller commences the transit, and was conveyed on by rail to Bokhara. Here the brazen pot of Russian supremacy appears to be ousting the old earthenware pipkin of native rule. But, on the whole, the author was viewed with less suspicion than on his previous visit, and the natives had become so used to the kodak that protests against its use were but rare. One of these, however, was raised when he wished to photograph the city prison, a wretched and overcrowded building, where he was shown a gloomy hole, in all probability the identical bottle-shaped dungeon where some fifty years ago poor Stoddart and Conolly languished for months before their execution.

The author's approach into Chinese territory lay by way of Kuldja and the Muzart Pass over the Tian Shan range, an exceptionally difficult route, as geographers know. At one point there has been erected a marble monument, with an inscription in Turki to this effect:—

"He who comes this way once may be pardoned, as not knowing what he is doing;

"He who comes twice is a fool; whilst

"He who comes a third time is hopeless as a Kafir (or infidel)."

But if Chinese Turkistan be difficult of access, it would seem as if the Russians did their utmost to atone for its drawbacks. The Governor-General of Russian Turkistan kindly directed that Dr. Lansdell's letters and telegrams should be sent on from Osh, which meant sending them by messenger about 250 miles to Kashghar; and, as if that were not enough, M. Petrovsky, the Russian consul, sent on the one telegram received for the author 180 miles further, to Kharghalik, or no fewer than 430 miles beyond the postal radius, and that without charge of any kind. Even so trifling a communication as a post-card which had arrived for Mr. Littledale in Ferghana, after he had left for the Pamirs, was sent after him by messenger more than 200 miles.

One of the lesser-known places visited by Dr. Lansdell was Khotan, the remoteness of which has deterred many from diverging thither from off the main route between Yarkand and Kashmir. Yet Khotan is one of the oldest cities of Central Asia, for Chinese annals of the seventh and eighth centuries attest that she had then chronicles of her own, and the tales told by Johnson, Forsyth, Caroy, and others, of buried ruins, inscriptions, coins, treasure, and jewellery, ought to be enough to whet the curiosity of many an archaeologist. Dr. Lansdell, in his anxiety to extend his researches in all directions, made inquiries for specimens of Khotan female beauty whom he could photograph. The reply of the native agent was characteristic. It was contrary to custom and law for women to have their portraits taken; but he added that the best plan would be for the author to inform the landlord of the serai that he wanted a pretty wife, requesting that four or five might be brought up for choice. "And then," said he, "as soon as they come you can take their portraits." The invitation was eventually issued to the ladies in a less compromising form, but, fortunately for the author's reputation, none of the young women came.

Some reflections on the political condition of Chinese Turkistan form the subject of one of the concluding chapters; but the facts and conclusions are for the most part not new. We have often heard of the favour accorded to Russian travellers, the respect shown for Russian passports, the exactions levied on British traders, and the summary confiscation of Indian tea imported into the country. As for openly expressed hopes that the Russians or British would speedily annex the country, such remarks are probably manufactured to please the questioner, and worth less than nothing. In any case they are purely speculative, and betray a singular ignorance of Chinese policy.

The author did not quit the scene of his labours without an effort to get on to Lassa. He, oddly enough, conceived the idea of arming himself with a testimonial from the Archbishop of Canterbury, as a sort of letter of recommendation or credentials from the Grand Lama of the West to his brother in the East! The project was grotesque enough: still, if ever the holy city is entered again by a European, it will certainly be with the aid of the Tibetan ecclesiastics rather than the Chinese authorities. The precious letter was engrossed on ornamental paper, sealed with the archiepiscopal seal, mounted on yellow satin, and enclosed in a red morocco satin-lined case, but no opportunity occurred of forwarding the letter and its translation either from Leh or Darjeeling. Dr. Lansdell was enabled, however, to penetrate to Kham-mandu, the capital of Nepal, a feat of which he may be proud.

The bibliography and index are not the least important fruits of an expedition which will, at all events, help to familiarize British readers with a country whose relations with India must always invest it in our eyes with peculiar importance.

Marchmont and the Humes of Polwarth. By Margaret Warrender. (Blackwood & Sons.)

BRECKENSHIRE, though it has not yet found its county historian, has been fortunate in its family histories—on the Swintons of Swinton, the Haigs of Bemersyde, and now on the Humes of Polwarth and Marchmont. Held previously by Polwarths and Sinclairs, the Polwarth estate passed by marriage in the fifteenth century to Sir Patrick Hume, whose namesake and seventh descendant, the well-known Scottish patriot, was by William III. created Lord Polwarth in 1690, and Earl of Marchmont in 1697. It is round Sir Patrick that the chief interest centres. Every one knows, or should know, the story of how at the time of the Ryehouse Plot he had to hide in the vault beneath Polwarth Church, and how his daughter Grisell, a girl of eighteen, used every night to convey him the food which she had slipped off her plate at supper. Once her small brother Sandy exclaimed in consternation, "Mother, will ye look at Grisell? While we have been taking our broth she has eaten up the whole sheep's head." Sir Patrick got safe to Holland, but returned thence in less than a twelvemonth as one of Argyll's unfortunate expedition. A letter from him to his wife describes the fray at Muirdyke, and relates that "the soundest Sleep he ever got in his Life was upon the Corpse of his Dearest friend, as a Pillow after the Action." With half a dozen others he escaped into the Highlands, where "they suffered much from Hunger, Thirst, and Fatigue. Sir Patrick was so worn out that he laid himself down in a Glen; the others climbed up the Rock to a Shieling, where they got some Milk. They carried some to Sir Patrick, but it was so full of hairs he could not drink it. At last they met with a Charitable old Lady, who concealed them in an old Castle, and carried Victuals to them during the Night. Once she fell into some water, so that they were obliged to put her into their own Bed, whilst they dry'd her clothes, which were much wet."

Again Sir Patrick got safely to Holland, and again he returned, this time for good, with William of Orange, who, over and above his other honours, assigned to him "an orange proper with an imperial crown to be placed in a surtout in his coat of arms." His daughter Grisell is famous as the song-writer Lady Grisell Baillie (1665–1746); her best-known song, "And werona my heart licht I wad dee." Of her Miss Warrender might perhaps have told somewhat more, at the risk of expanding her volume, for there is little in it that we could wish curtailed. There is the weird legend, not yet a century old, of Harry Neale, who "fought wi' the deil." The version, however, given here varies in several points from that once told us by an old townsman of Greenlaw; e.g. the dead sister there was not herself mounted on horseback, but was being borne in a half-open coffin slung under the belly of a dark rider's horse. There is the story of how Sir John Paterson of Eccles made the heritors drunk, and then beguiled them out of an addition to his orchard; of it too we seem to have heard a variant, in which another Scottish baronet acquired in a similar manner the best part of his property. And there is this lively account by David Hume of how Pope's and Bolingbroke's friend, the third earl, came to marry again within a twelvemonth of his first countess's death:—

"Lord Marchmont has had the most extraordinary adventure in the world. About three weeks ago he was at the play, where he espied in one of the boxes a fair virgin, whose looks, airs, and manners had such a powerful and undisguised effect upon him as was visible by every bystander. His raptures were so undisguised, his looks so expressive of passion, his inquiries so earnest that every person took notice of it. He soon was told that her name was Crompton, a linen-draper's daughter that had been bankrupt last year, and had not been able to pay above five shillings in the pound. The fair nymph herself was about sixteen or seventeen, and, being supported by some relations, appeared in every public place, and had fatigued every eye but that of his Lordship, which, being employed in the severer studies, had never till that fatal moment opened upon her charms."

The very next day he proposed to her; and her portrait by Sir Joshua justifies his precipitancy, which was justified also by the happiness of their union. By his first wife he had had three daughters, the youngest of whom married Scott of Harden; by the second he had an only and much-loved son, who predeceased him. Thus, at his own death, in 1794, the earldom of Marchmont, which was restricted to heirs male, became extinct; but the title of Lord Polwarth was claimed successfully in 1835 by his grandson, Hugh Scott of Harden. The broad lands, however, had all been willed away to the earl's grand-nephew, Sir William Purves Hume Campbell, to whose son, Sir

Hugh Hume Campbell (1812-94), the present work is dedicated; whilst his personality was bequeathed to Mr. George Hugh Rose, afterwards a Secretary of State, who had "shown him the devotion of a son, and who was credited by rumour with a close though unacknowledged relationship." Sir George Rose it was who edited the three valuable, if somewhat heavy, volumes of the 'Marchmont Papers.'

"Etc" in the Latin inscription on p. 11 should be et; and "integritate" on p. 56 integritate. Henry VIII. was not king of England in 1493; and the Earl of Dumfries is more familiar as the "Marquis of Bute." The new prison and county courts at Greenlaw were erected in 1831 (not "about 1830"); and Inigo Jones was not the architect of Heriot's Hospital. It is curious to learn that Lady Stair was "commonly called Witch Meggy," but the 'Bride of Lammermoor' might well have been mentioned in the foot-note concerning her. And, lastly, we should like to have been told who was the "Lionel, Count de Dysart," who painted a portrait of Charles XII. of Sweden, now let into a panel in the saloon at Marchmont. It looks as though it should be one of the three Lionel Tollemaches who flourished between 1648 and 1770, and the first and the last of whom were Earls of Dysart; but none of the three is likely, we conceive, to have painted the portrait of the Swedish hero. That is the whole of our fault-finding. Miss Warrender has done her duty admirably by her ancestors—she is a fifth descendant of the second earl.

Yet valuable as is her work, it has not the charm and interest of her appendix—fifty pages of "Anecdotes of the Family of Marchmont," dictated in the last year of her life by Lady Anne Purves (1698-1784), and "wrote in this Connected state by Sir Alexa' Purves's particular desire, who often heard them Narrated by his Mother." To say this is small disparagement of Miss Warrender, for these "Anecdotes" are simply the most delightful document of the kind we have ever lighted on. They are just the old lady's rambling reminiscences of two or three hundred of the members and kinsfolk and connexions of the Polwarth family. There is the Lady Julian Carre, who took for her second husband the Earl of Haddington, and, he having cheated her son out of the lands of Coldstream, "threshed him heartily, and once tossed him over a Stair, where he would have paid very dear for his deceit, if the Butler had not by accident been in the way, and preserved him." There is Lady Newton with her only son, whom she "spoiled so much by her Over-fondness as made him also a Pest to Society" (what a touch of feminine malice in that "also"!); There is Grissell's husband, George Baillie of Jerviswood, who had "attended his father to the Scaffold, which gave him a Surliness in his Look, altho' he possess'd the most Humane heart." There is the daughter who "made it her Constant Study to please her Father, and became the best Confectioner and Pastrycook, by making patisserie for him which he liked. She made a pie for him one day which was observed had no Pepper; she answered smartly, 'My Father eats no Pepper.' He said, 'Megg, continue to please your Father, and I'll make your Sisters to wipe your Shoes for you.'"

There is Mr. Robert Johnstone of Hilton, "a great Nimrod, and who had an infinite fund of Humour." There is Lady Cessnock; her

"disposition was frugal, but she loved show and Magnificence; wished that her Daughters should learn every Accomplishment, but was loathe to pay for proper Masters to instruct them; would give any price for showy silks to deck them out with, but grudged to give them proper Linens, or other necessaries; kept them at a great distance, and would not allow them to sit down in her presence, but did not keep up that Dignity which creates respect. She used to listen at their Door, and got a Slipper thrown at her head, which was said to be intended for the cat."

There are many more, but these samples must stand for the rest, with the proviso that they lose much by being thus wrenched from their setting. "Lady Margaret Belenden" is good, but Lady Anne Purves is better.

History of the Holy Rood-tree: a Twelfth Century Version of the Cross-Legend. With 'Notes on the Orthography of the Ormulum' (with a Facsimile), and 'A Middle-English Compassio Mariæ.' By Arthur S. Napier. (Early English Text Society.)

THE edition of the 'History of the Holy Rood-tree,' which occupies the greater portion of this volume, is the first instalment of a collection of the hitherto unpublished Old English homilies which Prof. Napier is preparing for the Early English Text Society. To this the editor has appended two articles on subjects connected with early Middle-English literature which have, in a somewhat less complete form, already appeared in periodicals. Although the volume is of small size, it contains several very noteworthy original contributions to knowledge, and cannot fail to add to Prof. Napier's reputation as an accurate scholar and a laborious and sagacious investigator.

The MS. from which the 'History of the Holy Rood-tree' is printed was written in the latter half of the twelfth century, and contains about eighty English homilies, thirteen of which are still unpublished, and will be included in Prof. Napier's forthcoming collection. The 'History' relates the adventures of the wood of the Cross from the time of Moses—not, as in later versions of the legend, from the time of Adam—down to the finding of the Cross by Helena. As Prof. Napier finds linguistic evidence to prove that the work is modernized from an original written early in the eleventh century, which must itself have been derived from a Latin source, the interesting conclusion follows that the first composition of the story belongs to a date very much older than that which scholars have hitherto ventured to assign for it.

Prof. Napier's exhaustive discussion of the mutual relation of the chief known forms of the cross-legend leads to some novel and apparently well-established results. It was maintained by Wilhelm Meyer that the versions contained in the 'Cursor Mundi,' in the French prose narrative by Andrius (found in a late thirteenth century MS.), and in the fourteenth century Dutch poem called 'Dboec van den Houte,' are all derived from the widely diffused Latin prose legend contained in MSS. of the thirteenth and following centuries, and first printed in full by Meyer himself. A new light has been thrown on this part of the question by the facts now first brought forward by Prof. Napier. The Rood-tree portion of the 'Cursor Mundi' is in great part a close translation (though with some additions from other sources and various abridgments and alterations) of an unpublished French poem, from which copious extracts are given in the appendix to the present volume. Further, the work of Andrius is shown to be a translation from a Latin text not greatly differing from that preserved in a twelfth century MS. at Cambridge. Prof. Napier's view is that Meyer's legend, which brings down the history of the cross-wood from Adam, and the antecedent of the Cambridge text, are two divergent elaborations of a common original. The French poem, and the Latin work represented by the 'History of the Holy Rood-tree,' he believes to be based on the proximate source of the Cambridge MS., while the Dutch poem is partly from this source and partly from others, Meyer's legend being one of them.

Although, so far as the editor has been able to discover, not showing acquaintance with any extant form of the cross-legend other than that found in the Cambridge MS., the author of the 'History' has handled his original with great freedom, not only indulging throughout in copious amplification, but introducing new incidents and personages. His extraordinary ignorance of the Bible may be seen from the fact that he imagined Moses and David to be contemporaries, and from his statement that David lived seven hundred years after his interview with Moses. Prof. Napier gives good reason for believing that the additional matter in the 'History' is due not to the English writer, but to the Latin original from which he translated. The 'History' makes the meeting of Moses and David take place "at the town that is called Robathi, where King Nebuchadnezzar was born." Prof. Napier thinks that Robathi "doubtless" originated in a transposition of Thabor, a name which occupies what may be called the corresponding position in some copies of Meyer's legend (others read Oreb). The explanation does not seem to us very plausible; but if correct it involves the conclusion that the author of the 'History' drew from some source which agreed in this particular with Meyer's legend and differed from the Cambridge text. The 'History' is also peculiar in mentioning "Quinquaginta Finices" as one of the stations of the Israelites in their march through the desert. Prof. Napier explains this by the supposition that finices had been substituted for the palmas of the Cambridge MS.; but as the transliteration of finices was not current in mediæval Latin, and does not occur in the Vulgate, it seems natural to suspect that the 'History' is partly derived from a version of the cross-legend translated from Greek.

The language of the 'History' is shown by Prof. Napier's analysis of its phonetic and grammatical features not to represent the genuine English of the twelfth century, but, like that of the Hutton Gospels and much of the homiletical literature of the period, to be mainly a rendering of the language of the eleventh century original into later orthography, with some new grammatical forms. As the text is accompanied by a translation, the editor has thought it unnecessary to add a glossary; but in the preface and notes he has called attention to some of the interesting features of the vocabulary. The work furnishes the earliest recorded instances of the words loop, root, and die (verb). It has usually been supposed (in spite of some phonological difficulty) that the verb to die was a Scandinavian importation; but its occurrence in this early text (the dialect of which is clearly West Saxon) favours the supposition that it may have been native English. As the word occurs in Old Saxon and Old High German there is nothing unlikely in this, though Danish influence doubtless led to its more extensive use.

The 'Notes on the Orthography of the Ormulund' explain, with the help of a facsimile, Prof. Napier's discovery that the ingenious phonetician of the early thirteenth century used distinct signs for the "hard" and the "soft" g. From the manner in which the symbols are employed he draws some doubtless sound conclusions as to the etymology of certain words.

The fragment of an English 'Compassio Marie,' which concludes the volume, is interesting as being probably a unique specimen of the Cheshire dialect of the thirteenth century. Prof. Napier has found its original in a Latin hymn printed by Dreves in 1890. The English translation is (except for an occasional anacrusis) in the metre of the original, which is the same as in the well-known 'Stabat Mater.'

A King's Hussar: being the Military Memoirs for Twenty-five Years of a Troop-Sergeant-Major of the 14th (King's) Hussars. Collected and condensed by Herbert Compton. (Cassell & Co.)

SERGEANT-MAJOR EDWIN MOLE had practically no active service, his only experience of it being towards the end of the war with the Boers, in which he was never under fire. In contrast with the experiences of the Indian Mutiny by Mr. Forbes-Mitchell this book is tame. At the same time, a non-commissioned officer of intelligence who relates what he has seen and heard during even a peace career of a quarter of a century must have something to tell his readers, and the frank simplicity with which these recollections are set down is attractive. On one point we condole with him. Mr. Compton, who has edited this book, is evidently not well read in recent military history, or he would have omitted that part of chapter xviii. which is called "The Story of Majuba." The sergeant-major frankly avows that it has been "pieced together from accounts given me, not only by our men who took an active part in it, but by many of the Boers themselves, with whom I was brought in contact later on." The account of the disaster is as unlike what happened as it well could be; in fact, it is a mere fancy sketch.

Once our hero, when a sergeant, was placed under arrest for allowing a prisoner to escape, and on the way to his quarters, "as I passed the barracks I was greeted with jeers from the men of a troop whose rooms overlooked my way. This I felt very severely, although their behaviour was not personal against myself, but the expression of the popular sentiment, 'No breaking, no making, which meant that if non-commissioned officers were never broken, there would be no promotion.'

This is not a particularly pleasant instance of the selfishness in human nature. We are happy to say that nevertheless there is much good feeling and fellowship between the men of a regiment, as is shown incidentally by the author in many passages. Probably the above manifestation was due to class antagonism, men necessarily almost always owing their punishments to the reports of the non-commissioned officers.

There is a tradition in India that the barracks on one side of the road at Meerut were once swept by cholera, while the inmates of the barracks on the other side of the road escaped. In the book before us an even more remarkable instance of what may be termed cholera zones is related:—

"Early one morning I was called to one of the troop bungalows at reveillé, and there saw an awful sight. During the night, out of thirty-two men in one division of the building, fifteen were seized. The rest of the troop were only separated by a partition wall, reaching but half way to the ceiling, so as to permit of the air circulating, and yet not a single man on that side of the wall had been touched."

When troop-sergeant-major of the dépôt of the regiment at Canterbury, only three or four years ago, our author found the recruits young, but well behaved. Contrary to his expectations, the canteen did not thrive, "although the majority of the recruits had each four or five shillings to draw every week." An illustration of the change since Sergeant-Major Mole first joined is afforded by the following story. General Thompson, Honorary Colonel of the 14th Hussars, visiting the dépôt one day, asked the sergeant-major for a suggestion for a little treat. The sergeant-major suggested a half-holiday to enable the men to visit Canterbury fair:—

"'Pooh-pooh, Sergeant-Major!' cried the old general, cutting me short. 'It is the soldiers I am speaking of—not the children.' 'Well, sir,' I answered, 'you asked me what would please the soldiers best, and I have told you.' 'What!' he cried, 'do you mean to say it is the soldiers who would like a half-holiday to go to the fair?' 'That's it, sir—the soldiers.' 'Dear me!' he answered, all taken back; 'in my time they'd have looked for a quart of beer each, and that was what I made sure you would ask for.' 'Well, sir,' I said, 'it's for you to give whatever you choose. But if you give the lads a quart of beer each, nine out of ten won't drink it, and the remainder will be in the guard-room for drink.'"

The half-holiday was duly given, to the great delight of the recruits.

These recruits our author divides into A, B, and C classes. A consisted of men who enlisted for love of the army and made the best soldiers. Class B was composed of men driven into the service by want. They were older than those of Class A, and many of them were dissatisfied. Class C, the least numerous, was chiefly composed of men who looked on enlisting as a trade; some, however, were army reserve men who had wished to remain with the colours, or men who, having been discharged invalided, after a bit recovered and managed to re-enlist under a false name.

It may be as well to see what the author says on the subject:—

"There-enlistment, or attempted re-enlistment of men from the reserve is, I think, one of the greatest arguments against the short service system. For by the very nature of their act, and the risk which they know it involves, these men prove their real love for a soldiering life. They are indeed, in my humble opinion, the very men who ought to be encouraged to serve on, instead of being forced to retire into inactivity before they have reached the early prime of life, and just when they have become efficient cavalry soldiers. Nor could any other employer of labour, except Government, command the services of a man in a particular profession for twelve years and then dismiss him with a prohibition from following it again."

The author is of opinion that a soldier is infinitely better off now than formerly:—

"A private Hussar in the early sixties was a clever man if he was 'on' threepence a day for the last half of each month.....but now any decently-behaved recruit can walk up to the pay-table once a week and take off three to five shillings certain.....A young fellow who has learnt a good trade, or has fair business prospects, may be wise to remain where he is.....but.....the pickers-up of promiscuous livelihoods would do well to take the Queen's shilling."

As to promotion from the ranks, he regards a commission as an off-chance, and "not always an unmixed blessing." Probably most non-commissioned officers are of this opinion. Like all true Hussars, Sergeant-Major Mole is devoted to horses, and writes sympathetically and pleasingly about them.

NEW NOVELS.

Some Every-Day Folks. By Eden Phillpotts. 3 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

THE quiet annals of "a miniature town on the skirt of Dartmoor" during the space of twelve months are the materials which Mr. Phillpotts has chosen for a story which may be about "every-day folks," but which is certainly not an every-day novel. His pages are full of a genial humour and shrewd but kindly observation of his fellow creatures, which recall Miss Mitford at her best amongst the village gossips. Miss Minniffe, the maiden lady who constantly disputed the temporal and spiritual supremacy of Heatherbridge with the vicar's wife and settled every one's affairs out of hand, is a delightful and vivid piece of character drawing. Her filial devotion to the "senile, toothless, hairless old gentleman" whom she looked upon as "Wisdom" personified; her lifelong flirtation with the elderly sea-dog, whose blandishments and artifices never brought him any nearer to his goal; her despotic but benevolent sway over the neighbours, rich and poor, and the gallant fights she waged with her arch-enemy, Mrs. Meadows, are all excellent reading. There are other character sketches almost as good as that of Miss Minniffe, but nobody else is quite so entertaining. Marian Deane's love story is a pretty romance against a woodland background; indeed, there is a plein-air atmosphere of sunshine and breezes throughout the book. The delinquencies of the ornamental curate, the tyrannical nature of the vicar's wife, and all the busy local life of a little town are full of humour and reality. Mr. Phillpotts has been tempted to overcrowd his canvas a little, and to turn all into grist which presented itself to his fine mill. The book is therefore rather overlong for the nature of its subject, but then it is hardly ever dull.

In Cupid's College. By Mabel Hart. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

MISS HART has a certain vein of romance in her, which she showed in her pastoral 'From Harvest to Haytime,' and it is even more clearly revealed in her new story. 'In Cupid's College' combines tender feeling with a sympathetic and almost subtle study of a character not over common in English fiction. There is a homely saying in some parts of the country to the effect that "every family has its luny"—its harmless boy or girl with very little brain-power, rapid of speech and eccentric in action, but gentle, affectionate, sensitive, and mostly devoid of malicious tendencies. The type is common enough, and one would not expect it to be particularly attractive either to the writer or to the reader of novels. Ethel Carre is a "luny" of this kind. She is an only child, and, indeed, the cause of her mental deficiency is explained by Miss Hart with much precision. She is congenitally soft, and bears the penalty of her father's vice. There is a compensating passion of love between Ethel and her mother; and, fortunately for her, when her mother dies she finds other friends to supply the warmth and light which alone could make such a nature even approximately happy. Miss Hart is so far psychological, by intuition and sympathy, and always through the legitimate methods of romance, that she succeeds in making us accept this character as frankly as she has drawn it—a character profound in love and devotion, yet for one brief spell of alienating antipathy brought to the very verge of madness and crime. It is a worthy creation; and, for the rest, there are plenty of commonplace sanities in these three volumes, which justify their title, and will satisfy readers to whom poor Ethel Carre may appear as "a softy" and nothing more.

In an Orchard. By Katharine S. Macquoid. 2 vols. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

VERY pretty, but very alight, is the story of the young Norman ingénue who learns to know her heart only after the death of the affectionate husband who has evoked its capacities. Till the faithful Charlot is no more, Gabrielle is an innocent coquette, whose strongest passion is for fruit, and who enjoys teasing adolescent admirers to whom she gives nothing in return. "Some people are born good," she remarks when Charlot is proposing for her hand, "and they always have good ideas ready-made; they do not have to puzzle out which of their thoughts are right and which are wrong. Wrong thoughts are always the most amusing, you know." When she thinks wrongly, she prefers Pierre Sarrazin, the burly Breton, to the refined and diffident youth who becomes her husband. But when Pierre again presents himself to the young widow, right thoughts at once suggest the contrast between passion and unselfishness, and she estimates the dead and living lovers at their proper value. It is needless to say that the author is as successful as usual in the minute photography of French turns of thought and speech. Such combatants as Madame Lagrive, Gabrielle's fierce old grandmother, and Madame Crispin, the shoemaker's wife, conduct their veiled hostilities with all the courtesy of war; and that snake by the good man's hearth, Léocadie, is well contrasted with the domestic excellence of M. Marie, Charlot's father, and his almost saintly wife.

The Prophet John. By Frederick Boyle. (Chapman & Hall.)

THERE is plenty of incident and action in this "romance." Yet the doings of the Brotherhood, a strange body of fanatics, are a little clumsy for the nineteenth century. Certainly such an acquisitive charlatan as the burly Prophet, who takes every pains to secure the endowment of his sect, would never have allowed Sir John Upcombe to execute so crude a will. But Hugh Upcombe, the heir-at-law, like a gallant soldier, prefers to recover his heritage by means of the prescribed marriage with the Prophet's daughter rather than set the Chancery Division in motion on the subject of mortmain or otherwise. Among various expedients for the destruction of their foes the brethren rely much on certain insect and reptile poisons, prepared by a scientific brother, whose cold-blooded absorption in his experiments is the one really striking conception of character which the author has formed. For the rest, Lady Marjory, a kind-hearted but conventional old lady of fashion; Lord Goding, who points out to the scientist that "it seemed improbable to him that all mankind had gone to the devil except a few ratepayers at Torquay"; Dick, the cheery little lover of all the "finest" girls of his acquaintance; and the bovine, statuesque Mabel Thurlby, who makes up by the gallant courage she shows in defence of her friends for a certain dulness of perception and emotion in ordinary circumstances, are sufficiently differentiated. The Cornish pirates savour of the lyric stage; but the story is readable in spite of some absurdities.

Not Angela Quile. By Nathan Hoeken Dole. (Gay & Bird.)

How a writer who, as Mr. Dole announces on his title-page, has translated such novels as 'Anna Karenina' and 'War and Peace,' can, with these examples before him, venture to send forth so stupid a novel as this is almost incomprehensible. The subject is of two pairs of lovers who exchange partners. It is one that might have been treated humorously, but there is not a glimpse of humour in the book, or so as to arouse sympathy for a rather unjustifiable proceeding; but the lovers reject one another in such a way that sympathy is impossible. But if the story, such as it is, were even told simply it would be more pardonable; instead of that the reader is deluged with utterly irrelevant accounts of New York social clubs, spiritualist séances, and mutual improvement societies, with pages of bad poetry and with uninteresting talk. We seem to have met several novels with similar characteristics from New York lately. They do not give English people a particularly flattering idea of New York life, and for their story they seem hardly worthy of an English publisher's attention.

ECCLÉSIASTICAL HISTORY.

History of the Christian Church. By Philip Schaff, D.D., LL.D.—Modern Christianity: The Swiss Reformation. 2 vols. (Edinburgh, Clark.)—These volumes—the last, we think, that Dr. Schaff lived to publish—bear witness, like all his works, to wide reading and conscientious preparation of materials. But they show rather industry than power, and one feels as one turns the pages as though enjoying the conversation of a man with an exceptionally well-stored memory rather than the sustained production of an historian who has conceived his subject as a whole. He supplies a series of monographs dealing with the different regions which afterwards came to make parts of the modern Switzerland, and these to a large extent in the form of biographies of the leading Reformers. The result is that the reader is apt to be confused by a succession of chapters overlapping in time and also in subject. For the constant intercommunication of the Reformers renders it impossible to treat each of them singly, and the same facts have to be repeated in different connexions. There are also too many repetitions of common remarks, and even of single phrases. There was no reason to mention twice Majunke's theory that Luther committed suicide (pp. 116 and 827), and the reader gets tired of hearing Gilg Tschudi called "the Swiss Herodotus," and Johannes von Müller "the Swiss Tacitus." Dr. Schaff wrote before all things for edification. He addressed, we should say, a class of theological students who looked back upon the Reformation as the headspring of their religious convictions, who counted the Reformers' cause their own, and desired to draw from the experience of the Reformers lessons which should serve them, as Protestant ministers, in their future work. There is, therefore, but little room for criticism of aims and actions, except when the question of religious toleration arises, and here Dr. Schaff unfurls bravely the standard of the nineteenth century, to the manifest disparagement of Calvin and Melancthon. So entirely does he assume the identity of the Church system set up by the Swiss Reformers and that familiar to his readers, that they will search in vain for any regular statement of the organization, the method of church government, the form of appointing ministers, at least in German Switzerland. In dealing with the Reformation at Geneva the account of the constitution set up by Calvin is, indeed, far fuller, but this too leaves much to be desired in point of precision. This looseness is the stranger because Dr. Schaff has taken great pains in describing the civil constitution of the states with which he is concerned. There is a certain pathos in the old professor, in the fiftieth year of his career as a teacher—after forty-nine years spent in America—gathering together all the little facts and details of places and persons belonging to the country of his birth. The work was to him a labour of love as well as of patriotism, and it would be ungenerous to complain that he wrote it after his own fashion, not altogether methodically or critically, but with zeal and honest piety. One feature in the book commands our unmixed admiration, and that is the excellent and elaborate bibliographies prefixed to each chapter. They are not of course so full as the lists contained in Herr Brandstetter's encyclopædic 'Repertorium,' which appeared in 1892, but they are quite sufficient for all but specialists in Swiss history. Nor should we omit to notice the extensive extracts translated from the writings of the Reformers, especially from those of Calvin, whose life and work, as might be expected, are treated at length, and form the subject of by far the larger part of this book.

It is hard to speak of The Life of George Herbert of Bemerton (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge) without seeming to be indulging in mere panegyric; for it is a long time since a volume has come under our notice characterized by so much careful learning, so sober in tone, so graceful in execution, and exhibiting so much gentle and tender treatment of the subject in hand. Not less appreciative or painstaking than the "layman" who some forty years ago published the elaborate life of Bishop Ken, this anonymous biographer is superior in literary skill, for Mr. Anderdon could do almost anything except write good English. Herbert's new biography is, on the other hand, written in an easy and attractive style which carries the reader on from page to page. Izaak Walton's life—like every other life he wrote—was a poem that will not bear meddling with by any dry-as-dust editor of the modern type. This book is a prose supplement to Walton, and the reader of Walton's life feels that he should like to know more of "holy George Herbert," more about his boyhood, his early home, his university career, his friends and associates, and the "outer round of circumstances" which helped in the formation of so lofty a character. This volume supplies just what was needed—glimpses of Montgomery Castle, where he was born; of the home at Oxford where young John Donne first made his acquaintance in his mother's house; of Cambridge and the academic life of which Herbert was so brilliant an ornament; of Chelsea and the "glorious fellowship of living men" who resorted thither; of Little Gidding and the devout life that Nicholas Ferrar and his associates kept up there at so very high a level of endeavour and aspiration; of many another scene and personage more or less intimately associated with a hero whose biography surpasses fiction in its romantic and unique story. It is well that such a life should not be forgotten, and that young men and maidens—and not they alone—should be attracted to it by a narrative such as this, which draws a picture where all the landscape and all the adjuncts serve admirably to make us understand and love the pure and noble-minded personage whose portrait stands in the foreground. Whoever may be the writer of this life—and we do not care to ask, or to attempt to penetrate his incognito—he must be a man one would like to know, as his book is one which none can read without rising from it with a sense of having gained something by the perusal.

To the British public in general Fra Paolo is little more than a name, and consequently we were inclined to welcome Fra Paolo Sarni, the Greatest of the Venetians, by the Rev. A. Robertson (Sampson Low & Co.); but unfortunately Mr. Robertson is, if we may judge by his volume, destitute of the training necessary to the successful study of history, and possesses neither the knowledge nor the temper requisite for a biographer. In spite of the author's enthusiasm for his subject his book is valueless.

SHORT STORIES.

SEVERAL of Mr. Zangwill's contemporary Ghetto characters have already become almost classical, but in The King of Schnorrers, Grotesques and Fantasies (Heinemann), he goes back to the Jewish community of the eighteenth century for the hero of his principal story; and he is indeed a stupendous hero. He is a Spanish Jew rejoicing in the high-sounding name of Manasseh Bueno Barzillai Azevedo da Costa, and the dictatorial self-assertion with which he plies his trade of begging in no way belies his titles; he conforms exactly to La Sage's observation "que les Espagnols mendient on grondant d'un air orgueilleux," and achieves his objects with so much ingenuity that that author would hardly have disowned him. Of all his exploits it is difficult to decide whether his device for obtaining the best box in a theatre, his cool method of turning the tables on the Mahamad, or the stratagem whereby he got himself invited to the stingy Rabbi's table is the most magnificent; anyhow he is well named the king of beggars. After this the best story is another Jewish one called 'The Rose of the Ghetto,' which introduces us to Sugarman the Shadchan, whom we have met before; but he has never appeared to such advantage in his office of marriage-broker as in these negotiations for the marriage of Leibel and Rose Green. In these two and the other Jewish story, 'Flutterduck,' Mr. Zangwill shows the same wonderful power of giving life and humour to this strange people as in his other books about the Ghetto, whose very existence was almost unheard of before he wrote. The other "grotesques and fantasies" of which the book is made up vary in merit. For pure fun 'The Semi-Sentimental Dragon' and 'Mated by a Waiter' are excellent, while the quaint conceit of 'An Odd Life' is none the worse for the serious thought which underlies it. Some of the illustrations, such as those by Mr. Phil May, add greatly to the attraction of the book.

Or a series entitled "Stories from Scribner" (Sampson Low & Co.) we have before us the last three volumes, Stories of the Sea, Stories of Italy, and Stories of the Army, by various authors. In appearance they are charming little books, tastefully printed, prettily illustrated, and of a convenient size to put into the pocket; while the letterpress is very pleasant, comfortable sort of reading, if the epithet may be applied to stories which are never exciting or thought-awakening, and at the same time never actually dull. The stories we have liked best are 'A Charge for France,' by John Heard, jun., in the last volume, on account of a very good description of a cavalry charge; and 'Captain Black,' by Charles E. Carryl, in the first volume, a good detective story.

The Rousing of Mrs. Potter, and other Stories. By Jane Nelson. "Pseudonym Library." (Fisher Unwin).—Several American writers have achieved considerable success by stories about utterly trivial matters; but there are others who would appear to think that this success was due to the triviality of the subject, and not, as is really the case, to the admirable manner of its treatment. The lady who calls herself Jane Nelson is apparently one of the latter class. The stories she tells are in themselves nothing extraordinary, and there is no charm of narration or power of communicating a human interest to the commonplace characters so as to relieve the monotony. The only effect of the book is to create melancholy and an idea of squalid surroundings, unalleviated by any feeling of pity or even of disgust; probably this is because dull characters are placed in out-of-the-way yet tedious circumstances, without any attempt at explanation. The best story is a little Italian tale called 'Gardi,' the only one not about America; but even this one seems unfinished and inadequately thought out.

The Little Widow, and other Epitaphs, English, Irish, Welsh, and Scotch. By William Tirebuck. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.).—Mr. Tirebuck's "epitaphs" are only short stories, homely bits of human nature, ranging from the serio-comic of a schoolboy's speculation and expiation to the ghastly tale of a wife who does her drunken husband with furniture-polish, lulling him to a sleep from which there was no waking. The author shows his native and unsophisticated talent in these many-sided narratives, which are saved from banality by occasional touches of something better and stronger than talent. Indeed, it would not be surprising if many readers of 'Dorrie' and 'Sweetheart Gwen' should come to the conclusion that Mr. Tirebuck can do himself more justice in a short story than in a long one.

The Stone Dragon, and other Tragic Romances. By Murray Gilchrist. (Methuen & Co.).—We think it extremely doubtful whether this volume will appeal to even a limited circle of readers. A few there may be not to be repelled or bored by what looks very like affectation and weakness, yet seems meant for something very different. Those who have no acquaintance with, nor interest in, the revival of magic, black or white, nor in folk resembling basilisks and wearied "demon gods," with the fascination of the cockatrice—whatever fascination that may please to be—will certainly be neither amused nor edified. As for the women, if such they may be called, they are incredibly and tediously fantastic. These poor creatures of uncontrolled and sickly passions are generally robed in something "rich and strange," a rippling gown of flame-coloured silk, perhaps, adorned with yellow tongues, or a web of diaphanous silk or white satin brodered with serpents—not too securely fastened. Fowls that look like men or vice versa, repulsive crones, gibbering blackamoors, may be met. There are "haunts fit only for demons," hell gardens, "monstrous shadows," "hissings of strangled snakes," "laughter like a rippling running tune that should have quickened the dead entrails of the marsh," and a number of more persons, places, and things not too delightful.

Outlines. By Florence Henniker. (Hutchinson & Co.).—Mrs. Henniker's readers look with interest for arrivals from her pen. If she generally writes in a minor key, it is usually of agreeable people and in a natural, well-balanced manner. Above all, she knows what and what manner of person she is writing about. 'Outlines,' a collection of four stories dedicated to Mr. Hardy, is no exception. As the name suggests, these stories are slight in construction. In two at least the author's mood and manner do not materially differ from those revealed in 'Sir George' and 'Foiled,' and here, as elsewhere, she is worthy of her reputation. As we said, the dominant note is scarce of cheerfulness; yet the outlook might easily have been more determinedly grey. 'A Statesman's Love-lapse' tells of a situation not entirely new; but it is treated with some freshness and, above all, with a welcome reticence. The sentiments and sensibilities of the statesman himself strike one, all things considered, as over-acute. His strength and weakness are, however, well told. 'The Major's Prudigal,' an instance of the blindness of parental affection, is done in a half-pathetic, half-humorous manner. The good old soldier's innocent amusements and occupations, his confidence in his scapegrace son, and his chivalrous reception of the child-wife who falls into his peaceful household like a bolt from the blue, are prettily and touchingly drawn. This story is, in fact, by no means the worst of the cluster. It is distinctly superior in matter and workmanship to 'Our Neighbour Mr. Gibson,' a tale of the lower middle class. Though here and there the thing is cleverly and amusingly touched, there is a hint of something slightly amateurish; possibly the ground is imperfectly known and understood and the power of divination a little inadequate. 'A Sustained Illusion' is, as regards situation and achievement, perhaps the strongest; at any rate, it is the most painful of the quartet.

GENEALOGICAL LITERATURE.

Admissions to the College of St. John the Evangelist, Cambridge.—PARTS I. and II. January, 1629/30—July, 1715. (Cambridge, Deighton, Bell & Co.).—This volume consists of two parts, of which the former was printed and issued more than eleven years ago, and was duly noticed in the Athenæum at the time (No. 2883, January 27th, 1883). We spoke then of the exactness with which the college registers appear to have been kept, of the excellence of the edition, and of the flavour of the true antiquary communicated to the notes by the learned editor, Prof. Mayor, who with rare but characteristic loyalty has forborne to place his name on the title-page, and desired to give all the credit of the work to his college. In putting forth the first part now in company with its sequel Mr. Mayor has taken the opportunity of adding thirty pages of corrections and supplementary notices, which will be welcome to students of little-known persons and places. In the second part he has had the assistance of Mr. R. F. Scott, bursar of the college, and of the Rev. P. J. F. Gantillon. To the latter of these gentlemen is due the index, which Mr. Mayor rightly describes as "admirably carried out." It has, however, one very serious fault, for which we ought perhaps to blame the printer. There are, in fact, no fewer than twelve indexes, six for each part, of persons, places, trades, &c. (both English and Latin), schools, and letters testimonial; but there is no sort of indication in the headline, except the number of the part, to inform the reader upon which index he opens, and no table of contents to tell him how many and what sort of indexes he is to expect. This is, indeed, our only quarrel with the book. It is a model of good editorship, and will be found serviceable alike by local workers and by students of university history. It is natural to turn to the indexes of "trades, &c.," in order to ascertain how far the change which made our colleges the homes of the well-to-do rather than of all ranks of society had advanced by the time at which the present volume stops, namely, the first year of George I.; and the result is to confirm our previous belief that the change belongs mainly to the subsequent period of Whig ascendancy. As an indication of this, we may notice that at Wadham College, Oxford, so late as 1773 the custom of "chumming," or of two or more undergraduates sharing a set of rooms in common, was not entirely extinct. The variety of trades represented in the St. John's College list is most remarkable, but in this point there is little or no difference between the first series of thirty-five and a half years, and the second, which covers just half a century. True, in each there are many trades and occupations mentioned which are absent from the other; but this is mainly owing to irregularity of nomenclature, and it would be a refinement of criticism to distinguish the alchouse-keeper (coarctarius) whose son was admitted to the college in 1697 from the innkeepers (pau-doches) who appear repeatedly from 1634 onwards, especially since the learned editor has not invariably translated the same Latin name by the same English word. He began, for instance, by rendering agricola "farmer," but afterwards adopted the safer term "husbandman." We suspect that many, if not most, of the agricolæ whose sons went up in great numbers to St. John's were farm labourers; for "farmers" seem to be uniformly fermarii, and for "yomen" no Latin equivalent could be devised, so that they appear from first to last in English. As for the local distribution of the scholars, we notice the preponderance of the north of England, though hardly any district, except perhaps the West Midlands, is ill represented. The exception is curious, considering the connexion of the college with Shrewsbury School, which in turn accounts for an unexpected number of admissions from North Wales. The notes on part ii. contain a great deal of more than local interest. Here, for instance, is Thomas Baker's account of Titus Oates, who was admitted a subseizer in 1660:—

"He was a liar from the beginning, he stole and cheated his Taylor of a Gown, which he denied with horrid Imprecations, and afterwards at a Communion being admonished and advised by his Tutor, confessed the fact."

We conclude by a single instance of the biographical value of the book. On October 21st, 1668, appears "John Gosling, of East Molling (Malling), Kent, son of Isaac Gosling, 'mercier'; bred at Rochester under Mr. Edwards; admitted mizar.....et. 18." This is almost certainly the famous base singer Gosling, afterwards a gentleman of the chapel royal and minor canon of Canterbury, a man possessed of a voice of phenomenal depth, still famous by reason of an anthem which Purcell wrote for it. The 'Dictionary of National Biography' is unable to fix the date of his birth, and only conjectures that it took place "probably at Canterbury." There must, however, be a mistake in the present book when his son, the Rev. William Gosling, who was admitted pensioner in 1712 (again correcting the 'Dictionary of National Biography'), "annosagens 16," is stated to have been instituted to a living in 1780 (pt. ii. p. lxxvi).

Testamenta Karolensia: the Series of Wills from the Pre-Reformation Registers of the Bishops of Carlisle, 1553-1586. Edited by R. S. Ferguson for the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society. (Kendal, Wilton.)—Antiquaries will be pleased to see in print the wills contained in the registers of the Bishops of Carlisle, which begin and end, unhappily, in the fourteenth century. Some of them are interesting, but interesting or not we are glad to know what the Cumberland and Westmorland men in those days were like, and in their wills we have probably the most faithful delineation of them that can be found. We wish we could speak with approval of the way in which the volume is edited. Mr. Ferguson was not the transcriber; there are numerous mistakes in the Latin; the contractions are extended or not in a careless manner; and from the way in which stops are often inserted or omitted, we scarcely think that the editor has properly understood the meaning of what he prints. The old French language is certainly puzzling at all times, but we happen to have made a transcript ourselves of the will of Sir William Dacre, which Mr. Ferguson gives, and between our copy and his there are some remarkable discrepancies. On p. 5 "die huic" should probably be die Jovis. On p. 9, for "ab intento deodatis," read abintestati decedentis, i.e., dying intestate. On p. 16, for "quos," read quorum. On p. 23, for "panno lansali," read panno lanceali. On p. 74 an archdeacon of Carlisle leaves money to be distributed "inter pauperes de patria," meaning the district in which he was born, i.e., Rothbury in Northumberland. Mr. Ferguson does not understand this, and thinks that patria may be an error for "parochia mea." Unfortunately for this suggestion, the archdeacon's parish (that of Salkeld) is mentioned in the preceding paragraph. A few lines afterwards we have "posteneet" and "chausour," instead of posseuet and chaufour. On p. 144 "parentalia," if so written, is an error for parentela. The word "parentalia" has a very different meaning. But we shall not dwell further on these matters. We are sorry to have our pleasure in reading this volume marred by its imperfections, some of the most serious of which are to be found in the glossary by which it is accompanied.

The Genealogist's Guide. By G. W. Marshall. (Privately printed.)—No mere reissue of Dr. Marshall's well-known "guide," this portly volume contains a new and valuable feature in a list of references to parish registers which fills nearly eighty pages. The supplement also to the pedigrees indexed bears witness to the genealogical activity of the present generation; and there is no doubt that when the editor brings out the even fuller work he promises, he will find not only in future publications, but even in some already issued, much fresh material. The pointed remarks here made as to Col. Chester's collection of extracts from parish registers, now in the College of Arms, will be read by many with surprise; but Dr. Marshall is qualified to speak on the subject. He does not seem to look with particularly favourable eyes on

Mr. Gatfield's "guide"; but though arranged on different lines, it is a book that genealogists should not neglect. As for Dr. Marshall's book, it is simply indispensable.

The Frenches of Scotland. By A. D. Weld French. (Boston, Mass., privately printed.)—Mr. French continues in this treatise his notes on the name of French in all its forms, and gives a special account of the Frenches of Thorndykes. His researches are exceedingly thorough, but of no general interest. And in dealing with a name of this character it is always difficult, in early time, to tell when it is really a surname.

The Life and Times of Henry Burt of Springfield and some of his Descendants, by H. M. Burt and S. W. Burt (Springfield, Mass., C. W. Bryan Company), cannot be regarded as any great addition to genealogical literature. It seems that one Henry Burt settled in Springfield, on the banks of the Connecticut, in 1640, and his descendants (real and supposed) celebrated the event by a dinner on October 3rd, 1890, and the speeches delivered on the occasion are printed here. A large part of the volume is taken up with a sketch of life in New England in the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth, which, however interesting, is scarcely a contribution to genealogy; and scrappy memoirs of various Burts fill much of the remaining space. The most attractive thing in the volume is a memoir of Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., by the veteran reformer Mr. G. J. Holyoake. Why it is introduced it is hard to say, as no attempt is made to connect Mr. Burt with Henry Burt of Springfield. But, however irrelevant, it is the best written portion of the book.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHEIN & Co. publish Land Systems of Australasia, by Mr. Wm. Epps. There is little that is new in the author's account of the land systems of Australia, but the New Zealand part is full of interest, because experiments are being tried in New Zealand which are novel, and far in advance of those which have been the subject of a good deal of past attention in Australia. A policy which, although not very extreme, points in the direction of land nationalization has been attempted in New Zealand, and all who are interested in the land question ought to read the author's account of what is being done, even if it be too soon as yet to note results. There are a few misprints in the book, which is much too closely printed, and not pleasant in form.

A Sketch of the Life and Character of Sarah Acland, the wife of Sir H. Acland, edited by Dr. Isambard Brunel, the well-known engineer, and published by Messrs. Seesley & Co., is a volume of which the anonymous writer has no reason to be ashamed. It gives a pleasing idea of a woman of a serene and serious temperament who was admired by all who knew her. Her pleasant letters form one of the most interesting portions of the book.—Another memoir similar in intent, but more florid in execution, is the Life of the Princess Borghese, by le Chevalier Zeloni, translated by Lady Martin (Burns & Oates). The princess was a daughter of the sixteenth Earl of Shrewsbury; she was born in 1817, and died in 1840. She was evidently a good woman, but the Chevalier is so bent on praising her that he makes his readers hope she had a few faults.

MR. FISHER UNWIN sends us Lady Perfecta, a translation of a novel of Perez Galdos. It is a long time since we read Galdos's novel, and we are consequently unable to form an opinion of Miss Wharton's version.

The Christian Knowledge Society has sent a translation of the Bible into Portuguese. It lacks the Apocrypha, and no mention is made of whose translation it is. The same society sends us a version of the New Testament in the Secoana language. It is printed in much clearer type than the Portuguese Bible.

As we disagreed with Mr. Lang's condemnation of 'St. Ronan's Well,' it is all the pleasanter to find ourselves in complete accord with his praise of Redgauntlet, which fills the two volumes most recently issued of Mr. Nimmo's "Border Edition." The editor's introduction is unusually interesting, and our only objection to it is that Mr. Lang seems a little too much inclined to accept the statements of the so-called Counts Stuart d'Albanio. Mr. Lang's notes are also excellent, and some of the illustrations are extremely good.

SEVERAL new editions are on our table: the third of Mr. Horatio Brown's pleasant volume Life on the Lagoons (Rivington, Percival & Co.), to which illustrations have been added; and reprints, each in one volume, of Mrs. Needell's clever novel Julian Karadake's Secret (Warne & Co.), and Mr. Gissing's attractive tale The Odd Women (Lawrence & Bullen).

PROF. WALLACE's valuable work on The Logic of Hegel (Oxford, Clarendon Press) reappears in two neat volumes instead of one. The prolegomena now form a volume by themselves, and have been largely rewritten, and show a maturer cast of thought than their predecessors of 1873.

THE seventh volume of Book-Prices Current (Stock) has reached us. This useful work has now established its position, and must have saved many a collector a bad bargain. The chief feature of the past year has been the rise in price of Sir W. Scott's works, the first editions in the original boards. Mr. Slater adds:—

"At one time it seemed likely that a class of books that has only come into prominence during the past twelve months, consisting of strictly limited editions of the works of modern poets and essayists, might be able to compete to some extent with the older collectors' works, now practically unprocurable except at great expense, but this has proved not to be the case."

There is surely a misprint in the account of the sale of Mr. Dennis's library at Messrs. Sotheby's in December, 1892. Dyce's edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, in calf extra, can hardly have sold for 2*l.* 18*s.*

Burdett's Official Intelligence (Spottiswoode & Co.) is so well established in public estimation as to be above criticism. The liquidations and reconstructions and other financial troubles that marked 1893 have necessarily given Mr. Burdett much occupation, and it says much for the industry of Mr. Burdett and his assistants that the huge volume has appeared at the usual time. The special chapters include a careful one on local taxation. The numerous failures of Australian banks have led Mr. Burdett to print a synopsis of the laws affecting banks of issue in various British colonies.

L'Arte di prender Marito, by Paolo Mantegazza (Milan, Treves), is the latest work of an Italian writer who under cover of science produces annually volumes of a more or less prurient nature. The volume preceding the one we have before us for review was called 'L'Arte di prender Moglie,' and in this Mantegazza allowed his imagination full play. The present volume is more subdued, but nearly as objectionable, for a morbid unwholesome sentimentality takes the place of obscenity. The book might be designated as a mixture of Martin Tupper and Juvenal. It does not speak well for Italian popular taste that the works of this writer should find readers, but his appeal to the lower instincts of his countrymen in a large part explains the fact.

THE supremacy of the Americans as inventors and manufacturers of type-writers has been contested by Mr. Maskelyne, the modern magician. He has contrived a machine which differs in many respects, and for the better, from those which are imported. The inking and spacing arrangements are alike novel and ingenious. It is unfortunate, we think, that the American tradition of charging a high price has been followed by Mr. Maskelyne. Such a type-writer as he has invented could be sold for ten guineas, and if this were done the demand for it would be so great as to compel the American manufacturers to reduce their prices, which must be enormously in excess of those which would yield a handsome profit, provided the machines were manufactured in this country.

POST-GRADUATE STUDY AND DEGREES.

Cambridge, March 7, 1894.

THE scheme lately proposed by the Council of the Senate for encouraging the residence in Cambridge of mature students of "letters or science" appears to be the outcome of a general movement. Within a few days of its publication a proposal, like though different, was issued by the Oxford Hebdomadal Council. The London University Commissioners recommend that the degree of Doctor "should be conferred only on those who have by study or research contributed to the advancement of learning or science, and who either are graduates of the University, or, being graduates of other universities approved by the Senate, have pursued a course of post-graduate study in the University of London." And the Scottish Universities Commission is understood to be considering the propriety of adopting similar measures.

The Cambridge plan is the least revolutionary. The degree of Bachelor of Letters or of Science is to be open to graduates of Cambridge who have taken an honours degree in Arts, and give evidence of advanced work in the shape of a substantial dissertation; and to other graduates who reside and work for a year in Cambridge, and produce results approved by a board of studies. But this Bachelor's degree will not lead to the M.A. or the Doctorate. The Master's and the Doctor's degrees confer the University and the parliamentary franchise, and for this a residence of three years, or, in the case of "affiliated" students, of two years, is required. At Oxford the degrees of Master of Letters and of Science are proposed, and these may be attained by non-Oxford graduates after a minimum residence of two years. The course of study pursued must be approved by a special delégacy, but no examination or dissertation is expressly required. The Master of Science or Letters may by subsequent residence, but without further test, become qualified for the M.A. degree and all its privileges. In the reformed London University the foreign graduate may per saltum attain the degree of Doctor, after an undefined "course of post-graduate study" in London. He will thereby, for anything that appears to the contrary, acquire the same status and privileges as the London graduate who has passed the three or four examinations for the Bachelorship or Mastership.

These plans are doubtless due in the first place to the feeling that in England we have too little of that inter-university fraternity and hospitality which are exhibited by the great continental schools. At Cambridge graduates of Oxford and Dublin, where the "residence" conditions are analogous, can alone acquire full ad eundem privileges. In the universities of Scotland, though they are now governed by a common scheme of general ordinances, no provision has hitherto been made for the mutual recognition of degrees. The English universities have taken a tentative step forward by the recognition of certain affiliated universities, and at the present time a graduate of New Zealand, Adelaide, or the Cape of Good Hope may come to Cambridge as an "affiliated student." Such a student is exempted from the Previous Examination, and may take the B.A. degree with honours after six terms' residence, or enter for the first part of a tripos at the end of three terms. A university must, however, apply for affiliation, and so far no home or foreign university has applied, or is likely to do so. It would, perhaps, argue an admission of something like inferiority. The proposal that Cambridge should make the first overtures, and "recognize" universities of good standing, is a distinct advance in academic comity. It already "recognizes" British and foreign schools of medicine, at which candidates for the M.B. and M.D. degrees may pass two of the five years of medical study required for graduation; and its medical faculty has suffered no detriment from the concession. Rather it has gained in width and depth, until now its medical school is not inferior to any in the empire. The omen is good for the extension of the principle to literature, philosophy, and science.

Another cause which has doubtless been at work is the striking diminution in the number of students who remain in Cambridge after passing the first part of a tripos. In many departments the elementary courses are overcrowded with students. But the courses in the more advanced subjects, the research laboratories, the special libraries, and the working rooms of the University Library, are but thinly attended. A few candidates for fellowships at the larger colleges, four or five scholars and students holding special endowments, a dwindling number of candidates for the second part of a tripos, make up the total of the advanced students who in Germany would people the Seminar or the research laboratory. There are this year but 5 candidates for Part II. of the Mathematical Tripos, 15 for Part II. of the Natural Sciences Tripos (against 126 for Part I.), 12 for Part II. of the Classical Tripos, and 5 for Part II. of the Moral Sciences Tripos. Without in the slightest degree straining the resources of the University, these numbers might well be doubled. The teachers and the appliances exist; they need only to be put to fuller use. There are nine university teachers of high repute who are conversant with the advanced branches of mathematics; there are over twenty charged with the higher parts of pure and applied science; there are an equal number devoted to language and literature, to say nothing of the much larger number of college and other recognized lecturers in all of these departments. But for the branches included in the highest university examinations they have on the average less than one student apiece. It is not unnatural that they should seek to increase the inducements to post-graduate study. The M.A. degree has ceased to be a mark of higher attainments; it connotes simply the lapse of a certain time and the payment of certain fees. It is no longer a distinction. A new degree, not likely to be confounded with the old, and marked from the outset as implying a higher standard of educational attainment and capacity for sustained work, appears to be wanted, and not least by Cambridge men.

The details of this interesting scheme may require much consideration to adjust them to the existing academic mechanism, but the underlying principles are clearly based on important facts. The function of the University is not fully discharged by giving elementary instruction to undergraduates. If it is to carry its abler students to the higher levels of independent study and investigation, it must be prepared to accord them some distinctive recognition. To this end a special degree is the simplest and most familiar means. And if the University is again to become the resort of mature students from abroad, as it was in earlier times, it is expedient that their status should be recognized. If they are graduates of other universities, it is impolitic, not to say churlish, to ignore their degrees, and make the "Little-go" the only portal of admission to the academic commonwealth. There is room enough and to spare for such post-graduate workers, and if they show themselves capable of pursuing and profiting by Cambridge teaching, and produce results reflecting credit on its schools, it is fitting that they should receive a Cambridge testatur to that effect. The proposed degree, devised for the purpose and therefore unambiguous, would seem the most appropriate and attractive form which this testatur could take.

BACON AND BARTHOLOMEW ANGLICUS.

Bedford, Feb. 26, 1894.

MR. POOLE seems to misunderstand my position in this matter. I drew up a list of the eleven notes of Bacon's unknown, and suggested that Bartholomew agreed with them. I wish rather to find out who it was that Bacon meant than to identify Bartholomew with him at all hazards, but in my mind the result has not been to render the identification any the less probable. My points were:—

1. A Franciscan.—I am bound to admit that Bacon's words could mean a Dominican, but I am sure the idea would not occur to any one reading them.
2. A most famous professor at Paris.—Still, less famous than Alexander at Hales. Mr. Poole seems to think Albert is excluded because he was not a professor in 1267. This does not follow by any means, and if Bartholomew is ruled out, he seems the only possible name.
3. Not a student at any university.
4. Has written 'De Naturalibus.'—See chapters ix. to xii. of 'Op. Tert.' Mr. Poole will find the words ('Op. Tert.' p. 42), "Ille vero, qui composuit tot et tam magna volumina de naturalibus (de quo superior locutus sum), ignorat hæc fundamenta, et ideo suum medicum stare non potest."
5. In twenty books or so.—The most natural inference from Bacon's words (p. 30).
6. Does not know Greek, Hebrew, or Arabic.—Mr. Poole thinks this vague; at any rate, it rules out Thomas Aquinas, if not Albertus (who shows no sign of accurate knowledge of Greek), and admits Bartholomew.
7. Does not know mathematics, optics, &c.
8. Well-to-do.
9. Writings characterized by "Vanitas puerilis infinita; falsitas ineffabilis; superfluitas voluminis"; and "partes philosophiæ... sine quibus non possunt sciri que vulgata sunt.... auctor istorum operum omisit."—It is interesting to learn that Mr. Poole thinks these are terms in which Bacon could speak of the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas.
10. A Master in Theology or in Philosophy.—It is difficult to form any opinion as to the subject of this professor's lectures. Of course, being a friar, his degree was in divinity; the question is what he taught. Was he the first lecturer or the first writer on philosophy in his order? I think, the first writer.
11. Alive in 1267.—Mr. Poole's chief argument seems to be these, "The unknown is quoted in the schools like Aristotle"; "It is no mere compiler that Bacon attacks," but an exponent of principles. On the other hand, (1) it is a compiler that Bacon attacks, e.g. ('Op. Min.' p. 327). "Et vero laudo cum plurimum omnes de vulgo studentium, quia homo studiosissimus est, et vidit infinita, et habuit expensum; et ideo multa potest colligere utilia in pelago auctorum infinito." (2) Bartholomew's compilation followed the popular ideal of science in his time, and even Bacon's ('Op. Min.' p. 389): "Si igitur sciverimus omnium rerum proprietates tunc scripturam sciemus et philosophiam totam." (3) The fact of any work being a compilation would not, and did not, hinder it being quoted as an authority in the schools.

It seems to me, with all due respect, that there are only two writers in the thirteenth century who can be said to satisfy the conditions, Albert and Bartholomew, and of these two Bartholomew is the more probable.

ROBERT STEELE.

'POLWART ON THE GREEN.'

The Homestead, Latham, Ormskirk, Feb. 26, 1894.

FROM Mr. Logie Robertson's note in your issue of the 24th inst. there appears to be some uncertainty about the authorship of this fine song. In my copy of the first collected edition of "Poems" [By Allan Ramsay. | Edinburgh; | printed for the Author at the Mercat- | ry, opposite to Niddry's Wynd, 1720,] on a separate title-page (i.e.) is "Scots Songs | viz. | Mary Soot. Polwart on the Green. | Wine and Musick. John Hay's Bonny Lassie, | O'er Bogie. | O'er the Moor to Maggy. Genty Tibby and Sonny Nelly. | I'll never leave thee. Up in the Air," followed by the songs announced; and as they are "printed for the Author" there does not seem to be any ground for dubitation.

JAMES BROMLEY.

SALES.

THE Toovey sale continued through last week at Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge's rooms, and was brought to a close on Wednesday last. The following prices were realized in the third to the sixth day's sale. Cervantes, Don Quixote, 4 vols., Madrid, 1780, 20s. 10s. Dallaway and Cartwright's Sussex, 1815-30, 32s. 10s. Claude le Lorrain, Liber Veritatis, 1777-1804, 21s. 10s. Clutterbuck's Hertfordshire, large paper, 1815-27, 23s. Dugdale's Works, 1656-1718, 23s. 10s. Drosser, History of the Birds of Europe, 3 vols., 1871-81, 44s. Duncumb, History of Herefordshire, 1804, 11s. 10s. Dugdale, Antiquities of Warwickshire, large paper, 1730, 30s. Guillim, Display of Heraldry, large paper, 1724, 16s. 10s. Horæ B. Mariæ V. ad Usam Sarum, an illuminated MS. on vellum, fifteenth century, 80s. La Fontaine, Contes et Nouvelles, edition of the Fermiers Généraux, 1762, 30s. Hodgson, History of Northumberland, large paper, 1827, 52s. Horæ B. Mariæ V. ad Usam Sarum, printed on vellum, A. Verard, 1503, 75s. Horæ Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ ad legitimam Sarisburiensis Ecclesiæ Ritum, Paris, 1526, 19s. Lipscomb, History of Buckinghamshire, large paper, 4 vols., 1847, 26s.; another copy, on small paper, 12s. 10s. Hoare, History of Ancient and Modern Wiltshire, 8 vols., large paper, 1810-52, 81s. Hutchins, History of Dorsetshire, 4 vols., large paper, 1861-70, 13s. 10s.; another copy, with the coats of arms emblazoned, 20s. P. Nicole, Four Treatises, translated from the French by John Locke, the original MS. in Locke's autograph, 40s. 10s. Missale ad Usam Ecclesiæ Sarisburiensis, Londini, 1555, 28s. 10s. Ovide, Les Métamorphoses, 4 vols., 1767, 18s. 6s. Kit Cat Club, 1735, 19s. 15s. Missale ad Usam Insignis Ecclesiæ Sarisburiensis (two leaves in facsimile), Paris, 1555, 24s. 10s. Morant, History of Essex, large paper, 1768, 17s. 15s.; another copy, on small paper, 14s. 15s. Works of Sir Thomas More, Knyght, 1557, 14s. 10s. Legende Totius Anni tam de Tempore quam de Sanctis secundum Ordinem Sarum, Parisiis, 1518 (imperfect, several leaves in facsimile), 100l. Lancelot du Lac, French MS. on paper, with miniatures, in four volumes, fifteenth century, 410l.

The sale of the second part of the library of the Comte de Lignerolles (see Athen. No. 3459 for an account of the sale of the first part) began on Monday. The (first?) Aldine edition of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius, bound for Grolier, and bearing his name and device, brought 10,000 fr. A copy of the Oraisons Funèbres of Bossuet, specially printed for Berryer, fetched 1,500 fr.

At the sale of M. Octave Uzanne's library Son Alteesse la Femme, bound by Magain, and containing original drawings by Lynch, Gonzales, &c., besides unique states of the chief engravings, brought 2,500 fr.; La Française du Siècle, with thirty water-colours of Lynch's, fetched 2,605 fr.; La Femme à Paris, bound by Mounier, and containing original drawings by Vidal and Rudnicki, brought 2,000 fr.; and a copy of Le Livre, 700 fr.

"THE NEW PLUTARCH."

Marlborough, March 7, 1894.

I HAVE only just seen your notice (February 24th) of Messrs. Marcus Ward & Co.'s "Heroes of History." As you mention my name as one of the authors, allow me to say that the publishers did not ask my permission to republish my life of Sir J. Franklin in a series with a new name, and that I knew nothing whatever about it. Allow me also a word about my connexion with the "New Plutarch" series. I was asked by the editors in 1880 to write for it, and was told the payment would be 80l. or 100l. I wrote, accordingly, Sir John Franklin's life, and when I sent it to the editors it received their warm approbation. When, however, the time for payment came, I was told that the publishers were disappointed by the sale of the previous volumes of the series, and declined to pay 80l. or 100l., and they told me they were not bound in any way by the terms mentioned by the editor who had corresponded with me. To avoid trouble I accepted the small sum (15l.) they offered, with a twopenny royalty after 5,000 had been sold. The book was most favourably received, and as I was kindly assisted by Sir John Franklin's niece, and no other life of him, I believe, existed, it might have been fairly thought it would sell well. Nine years afterwards I saw in the Pall Mall Gazette a list of the most popular books in America, and of the biographies (only three, I think, in all) mentioned, one was a life of Franklin. I wrote to the Pall Mall Gazette's authority in America to ask if it was mine. The librarian replied that it was, that "it was most highly esteemed" there, and was in constant circulation at all the chief libraries in New York. From this I inferred that in America there must have been a considerable sale of the book. I then wrote to Messrs. Ward to ask how many copies had been sold in England, and whether they would sell back the copyright to me with the copies in stock. I have never received any answer. By the terms of the agreement they are only bound to render an account for settlement of royalty when any sum accrues; but I should be obliged to any reader of yours with more knowledge of such subjects than I have, if he would inform me (1) whether I have not a legal right to know meanwhile how many copies have been sold; (2) whether disposal of the book to an American publisher, without additional remuneration to me, would be an infringement of a royalty agreement such as that above mentioned; and (3) whether, when I have sold a book specifically for publication in a series called "The New Plutarch," the publishers have any right to publish it subsequently in a series with another name.

I may add that, for reasons not connected with the book itself, I think it probable that the sale in England was never large, and that I never blamed the editors in any way for what they deprecated as I did. A. H. BEEZLY.

Literary Gossip.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING intends to remain in Bermuda for a month and no longer. Thence he will return to Vermont, and it is exceedingly probable that the spring or early summer will see him in London, where he is called by private and business matters. He has occupied himself with verse lately, chiefly on naval subjects.

THE volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography' to be published on the 21st inst. reaches from Milman to More. Dr. Richard Garnett writes on Dean Milman and the poets James Montgomery and Tom Moore; Mr. J. Willis Clark on Isaac Milner, President of Queens' College, Cambridge; Mr. Leslie Stephen on Milton, Sir William Molesworth, Lady M. Wortley Montagu, and Hannah More; Prof. C. H. Herford on Laurence Minot; Mr. G. F. R. Barker on John Mitchel, the Irish Nationalist, on G. F. Mitford, first Lord Redesdale, and on Charles Montagu, first Earl of Halifax; Mr. F. Espinasse on Sir Andrew Mitchell, the diplomatist at Berlin; Major Darwin, M.P., on Sir T. Livingstone Mitchell, the Australian explorer; Mr. W. P. Courtney on the Rev. J. Mitford; Miss Elizabeth Lee on Miss Mitford; Col. Vetch, R.E., on Robert Moffat, the missionary; Miss A. M. Clerke on Abraham de Moivre and Sir Jonas Moore; Mr. C. H. Firth on George Monck, Duke of Albemarle; Sheriff Mackay on Lord Moncrieff; Mr. Warwick Wroth on Bishop Monk, the classical scholar; Dr. N. Moore on the three Alexander Monros and on Dr. John Moore, author of 'Zeluco'; Dr. J. F. Payne on the physicians James and John Monro; Mr. Richard Bagwell on General Robert Monro; Prof. J. K. Laughton on Admiral Sir W. Monson, John Montagu, fourth Earl of Sandwich, and on Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough; the Rev. William Hunt on Thomas de Montacute, fourth Earl of Salisbury, and on Earl Morcar; Mr. J. M. Rigg on Basil Montagu; Mr. Sidney Lee on Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu and on Sir Thomas More; Miss Kate Norgate on Simon de Montfort and on his sons; Mr. Joseph Knight on John Moody, the actor; Mr. Lionel Cust on Miss H. S. Montalba and on Albert Moore; the late Mr. H. Manners Chichester on General Sir John Moore, and Canon Overton on Henry More, the Platonist.

MESSRS. LONGMAN will bring out in the beginning of April the fourth and final edition of Prof. Bain's work 'The Senses and the Intellect.' The interval of time that has elapsed since the previous edition has been unusually fruitful in psychological investigation and discussion, and the author has endeavoured to take full advantage of the numerous suggestions that have been given forth to the public. He has obtained, from a competent hand, an entirely original chapter on the nervous system, and has otherwise improved the physiological parts. He has given a new turn to the handling of our most fundamental conceptions—such as space, time, the Ego—by a more thoroughgoing employment of the doctrine of hereditary transmission. He has further bestowed a copious treatment on the controverted issues respecting the classification and mutual dependence of the ultimate divisions of the mind.

WE are asked to say that Mr. Andrew Lang is not, and has never been, the editor of Longman's Magazine. Would-be contributors should therefore forward their articles not to Mr. Lang, but to Messrs. Longman.

THE Committee of the London Library has resolved to issue quarterly lists of accessions, instead of the yearly catalogues of newly purchased books which were inaugurated a great many years ago. The first of the new series of quarterly issues is just ready: it covers the period between May 1st and December 31st of last year, and contains above twelve hundred entries. An abundance of cross-references adds greatly to the utility of the publication. The list has been compiled by the new librarian, Mr. C. H. Hagberg Wright. A second issue is promised for May.

PROF. SAYCE writes to a correspondent that he has found in Egypt an early Coptic version of the letter of Abgarus.

THE annual dinner of the booksellers has been fixed to take place on Saturday, April 14th, at the Holborn Restaurant. The Lord Mayor has intimated his intention of being present on the occasion and taking the chair, and he is to be supported by several authors of note and many leading publishers.

AN édition de luxe of 'The Stickit Minister' will be published this year, probably in the autumn. It will have specially drawn initial letters and head and tail pieces, and will contain illustrations by Mr. Ernest Waterlow, Mr. Joseph Pennell, and others.

A VOLUME containing all the Rectorial addresses delivered at the University of St. Andrews during the last thirty years will be issued during March by Messrs. A. & C. Black, edited with an historical introduction by Prof. Knight. It will contain the addresses of Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell, Mr. John Stuart Mill, Mr. J. A. Froude, Lord Deas, Dean Stanley, Lord Selborne, Sir Theodore Martin, Lord Reay, Mr. A. J. Balfour, the Marquis of Dufferin, and the Marquis of Bute.

IT is a relief to find that Mr. Baron Pollock gave judgment for the defendants last Saturday in the case of Martin et uxore v. the Trustees of the British Museum. There is, it is said, to be an appeal, but it is to be hoped the decision will be confirmed. Otherwise it would be necessary to protect the national library by further legislation, for it would be impossible to leave the Trustees a target for any action of libel an enterprising attorney or capacious litigant chose to bring; and to suppose that libellous matter can be excluded from the Museum is obviously absurd.

A COMPREHENSIVE history of the parish church of Leeds is in preparation. It will be brought down to the present time, and will contain biographical notices of the different vicars who have officiated within its walls.

THE Manchester Guardian, in recording the death of Miss M. P. Cowdroy, says her death breaks a link in Manchester journalism. Her grandfather was the founder of Cow-drov's Manchester Gazette, to which the late Mr. J. E. Taylor contributed before he started the Manchester Guardian. The Gazette was carried on by Miss Cowdroy's father till his death, when it became the property of Mr. Archibald Prentice, who incorporated it with his paper, the Manchester Times.

Mrs. A. M. DIBIL, the author of 'The Garden of Eden,' has written a new novel which Messrs. Hutchinson will soon publish in three volumes, under the title of 'A Woman's Whim.'

THE death is announced of the Rev. E. W. L. Davies, author of 'Algiers in 1857' and the life of the Rev. J. Russell, the well-known sportsman.—Col. A. B. Ellis, whose death at Tenerife, from fever contracted during his recent expedition against the Sofas, is reported, was rather a voluminous writer. We noticed only a fortnight ago his 'Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa'; and another monograph of his, on 'The Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast,' was published in 1887. Towards the close of last year he had produced a 'History of the Gold Coast,' and he was the author of 'The Land of Fetish' (1883), 'West African Islands' (1885), and 'South African Sketches' (1887).

Song, the penny sheet of songs and ballads which has just begun to appear, is the production of the veteran Dr. W. C. Bennett.

THE annual meeting of the Society of Authors will be held on Monday week. The Committee of Management report that the income of 1893 is 200*l.* in excess of that of 1892, and that that was greater than the income of 1891. A number of medical and scientific writers have joined the Society, and it is desired to recruit in other departments of literature. Mention is made of the case Macdonald v. the National Review, with which the Committee is apparently pleased, although we believe that decision has done authors more harm than good.

THE Council of the British Record Society celebrated the Calends of March by passing resolutions in favour of removing parish registers to district Record Offices or to the Public Record Office in London, and of transferring non-parochial registers from Somerset House to Fetter Lane.

MR. LEWIS MORRIS's new volume of poems, 'Songs without Notes,' will include the Imperial Institute and the Royal Wedding odes, and will be published at Easter.

THE Cambridge Antiquarian Society intends to issue as a memorial of the late Dr. Luard a series of the Proctors' Accounts and Inventories, the Grace Books, and other documents. These records form an almost unbroken series, extending from the year 1454 to the present time, and Dr. Luard was anxious to see them in type. The earlier Grace Books contain the receipts and expenses of the proctors, who then received the fees for degrees and made payments on behalf of the University. As the names of those who paid fees are set down, these receipts are a record—at that date the only one—of the degrees taken; while the disbursements throw light on the buildings, the studies, and the life of the University. The inventories made in each year by the outgoing proctors are of interest, as they contain lists of University records and articles of value, as books, plate, or jewels, either belonging to the University or deposited in the chest as security for fees and fines. An editorial committee has been formed, consisting of Mr. J. W. Clark, Mr. Jenkinson (the University librarian), Mr. S. M. Leathes, Prof. Maitland, and Mr. Mullinger. The mode of editing will be similar to that of the Rolls Series; and the first volume, extending from 1454 to 1487, will be edited by Mr. Leathes.

A DIEZ Festival was celebrated at Bonn on March 3rd. As the centenary of Diez's birth falls on the 15th, we are at a loss to understand why the date was anticipated.

THE well-known Russian painter Verestchagin is said to have finished a novel entitled 'The War Correspondent,' the scene of which is laid in the last Turco-Russian war, at which the artist was himself present. The novel is expected to contain descriptions of the scenes of war, and it will be published simultaneously in Russian and German.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week include the Annual Report of the Railway and Canal Commission (3*d.*); Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to Honorary Degrees (1*d.*); and Correspondence on the Subject of the Difficulties experienced in bringing the Irish Education Act, 1892 (Compulsory Education), into Operation (1*d.*).

SCIENCE

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

Workers without Wage, by Edith Carrington (Griffith, Farran & Co.), is a collection of short and simple lessons on natural history, with questions and answers at the close of each. It is well suited for a Sunday-school class composed of little girls, but few boys over seven years of age would put up with the perpetual lecturing upon what the author calls "cruelty." Still, we can pardon a good deal of false sentiment for the sake of the following lesson, which cannot be too thoroughly rubbed into the present as well as the rising generation:—

"Some time ago cruel and foolish people actually took rabbits to Australia and New Zealand, that they might have the pleasure of shooting them there, for there were none in those countries before; and they [the people] have been fearfully punished since, for the rabbits multiplied so much that they destroyed the pastures and the crops, and almost made a famine in some parts by eating up every green thing. The reason of this was that in these lands none of the natural enemies exist—the rabbit not being a native—so there was nothing to act as policeman and keep their numbers thinned after they were once let loose. The New Zealanders have since been obliged to send to England for weasels, and stoats, and to pay large prices per dozen for these animals, to try if they will keep their rabbits in check."

Exactly so; and the small minority who are not fools are waiting to learn the result of the introduction of those stoats and weasels; meanwhile, how does the poultry fare? And how goes it in Jamaica, where the mongooses—introduced to destroy the rats—began by extirpating a petrel which used to afford food to some of the coloured population, and has probably made wild work with the domestic fowl by this time?

God's Birds, by John Priestman (Burns & Oates), is a description of the familiar species mentioned in the Bible. The earnest piety and good intentions of the writer are so obvious that we cannot criticize his remarks too seriously from the point of view of the ornithologist; in fact the book is a religious work, by no means unsuitable for children.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—Feb. 22.—The President in the chair.—The Bakerian Lecture, 'On the Relations between the Viscosity (internal friction) of Liquids and their Chemical Nature,' by Prof. Thorpe and Mr. J. W. Rodger, was delivered.

March 1.—Dr. Perkin, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read the list of candidates for election into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'Preliminary Note on Bi-lateral Degeneration in the Spinal Cord of Monkeys (Macaca sinica) following Unilateral Lesion of the Cortex Cerebri,' by Dr. E. L. Mellis; 'On the Effect of Magnetization upon the Dimensions of Wires and Rings of Annealed Iron,' by Mr. E. Bidwell; 'On the Relations of the Secular Variation of the Magnetic Declination and Inclination at London, Cape of Good Hope, St. Helena, and Ascension Island, as exhibited on the Magnetarium,' by Mr. H. Wilde; 'Terrestrial Refraction in the Western Himalayan Mountains,' by General Walker; 'Researches on the Structure, Organization, and Classification of the Fossil Reptilia, Part IX.: Section 1, On the Therapschia; Section 2, The Reputed Mammals from the Karroo Formation of Cape Colony; Section 3, On Diademodon,' by Prof. Seeley; 'On a Spherical Vortex,' by Prof. M. J. M. Hill; and 'On Correlation of certain External Parts of Palaeon serratus,' by Mr. H. Thompson.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 1.—Mr. A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—This being an evening appointed for the election of Fellows, no papers were read.—Dr. Freshfield exhibited a unique and most complete series of photographs of the walls of Constantinople, showing many features now destroyed.—An interesting collection of original carvings in ivory was also exhibited, consisting of figures and panels, &c., contributed by the President, the Rev. E. S. Dewick, and Messrs. Read, Ffungs, and Hope.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Major-General Sir F. W. Grenfell, Lieut.-Col. Welby, Capt. Anstruther-Thomson, Revs. A. H. S. Barwell and W. F. Shaw, and Messrs. M. Rosenheim, J. J. Tylor, W. G. B. Barker, T. Boynton, F. Candall, S. Young, W. Bennett, B. Nianis, E. T. Whyte, and F. Underwick, Q.C.; and as an Honorary Fellow, Dr. N. Pokrofsky.

LINNEAN.—Feb. 15.—Prof. Stewart, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. Whyte was elected.—Dr. M. Masters exhibited a remarkably good specimen of Peziza tuberosa on root of Anemone. It is only comparatively recently that the hard lumps (sclerotia) in the soil of anemone beds have been definitely associated with the fruit of this Peziza; at one time the sclerotia were regarded as diseased masses of the root-stock. Dr. Masters also exhibited some root-galls on plum caused by Cynips (Hirakia) terminalis. Mr. Cameron in his monograph on the Cynipidae, published by the Ray Society, has noticed galls formed by this insect on the beech, pine, and vine, but not on the plum.—Mr. D. Nicholl exhibited a singular variety of the partridge (Perdix cinerea), which had been shot by Mr. A. Waugh near Creawell, Northumberland, in September, 1893. In colour it resembled the red grouse, having the breast and flanks suffused with large patches of dark reddish brown, and the dorsal plumage very much darker than usual.—Mr. Harting pointed out that this variety was described and figured by the late J. Hancock in his 'Catalogue of the Birds of Northumberland,' where it had been met with more than twenty years ago, and in that county he himself had also procured a specimen at Corbridge-on-Tyne, which was preserved in the collection of varieties formed by the late Mr. F. Bond.—Mr. N. Douglass exhibited a black variety of the water vole, Arvicola amphibius, captured at Banchoory, Kincardineshire, remarking that this variety, which was at one time considered to be restricted to Scotland, had been met with in several English counties (Zoologist, 1892, pp. 281-293), and was well established in the fen-country of Norfolk and Cambridgeshire.—Mr. G. Brebner read a paper on the origin of the filamentous thallus of Dumortiera filiformis, in which by the aid of the oxyhydrogen lantern he demonstrated, 1, that D. filiformis has a creeping basal thallus by which it adheres to the substratum; 2, that the creeping thallus is perennial, and, when epiphytic, is attached to its host by plugs of tissue which cause marked disintegration of the cells of the host; 3, that the ordinary filiform thallus owes its origin to the intercalary transverse septation of the articulations of certain branches of the creeping thallus (the group of active filaments may be endogenous or exogenous, and the order in which the rows of cells become specialized is generally centrifugal); 4, that these specialized outgrowths emerge from the creeping thallus—remaining attached to it by the basal portion—and by the subsequent growth and division of the constituent filaments give rise to the annual well-known D. filiformis thallus.—The paper, which was listened to with great interest, was criticized by Dr. D. N. Scott, Mr. G. Murray, and others.—On behalf of Mr. D. J. Scurfield, a paper was communicated by Prof. Miall 'On Entomotrachea and the Surface Film of Water.' Briefly summarised, the principal views advanced in this paper were the following: 1. To many Entomotrachea the surface film of water is a very dangerous element in their environment. To this category belong large numbers of the Cladocera and Ostracoda. 2. To several, on the other hand, the surface film affords peculiar advantages. This class includes, so far as yet known, only a few specially modified Cladocera and Ostracoda, and some copepods, which do not, however, present any apparent structural modifications. 3. In all cases (except where some copepods possibly make use of the properties of the surface film to attach themselves to aquatic plants above the general water-level) the relation to the surface film, whether beneficial or the reverse, depends fundamentally upon the same physical principles, namely, the upward pull of the surface film when forming a capillary depression, and the possession by the animals of water-repellent shells, ridges, scales, or setæ, capable of penetrating the surface film, and producing capillary depressions.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—Feb. 28.—Col. C. Swinhoe, V.P., in the chair.—Prof. A. Foral, of the University of Zurich, was elected an Honorary Fellow, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Prof. H. A. Hagen.—Mr. J. Pratt and Mr. M. Y. Woolf were elected Fellows.—Mr. G. C. Champion called attention to a supposed new longicorn beetle, described and figured by Herr A. F. Nonfried, of Rakonitz, Bohemia, under the name of Callipogon freidländeri, in the Berl. Ent. Zeitschrift, 1892. He said that the supposed characters of the insect were due to the fact that the head had been gummed on upside down! He also exhibited an extensive collection of Coleoptera and Hemiptera-Heteroptera made by himself in the island of Corsica in May and June last.—The Rev. T. Wood exhibited a variety of Saturnia carpinis with semi-transparent wings, bred with several examples of the type-form at Baldock, Herts; also a pale variety of Smerinthus populi.—Mr. R. South exhibited a variety of Argynnis aglaia, approaching the form known as var. charlotta; a variety of Euchelia jacobae, in which the crimson costal streak was continued along the outer margin almost to the inner margin, taken at Ringwood, Hants, in 1893; a variety of Argynnis euphrasine, taken in Epping Forest in 1893; and a series of black and other forms of Phigalia pedaria, bred during the present year from a black female captured last spring.—Mr. H. Goss exhibited, for Mr. C. B. Taylor, of Jamaica, a beautifully coloured drawing of the larva of Papilio homerus, Fab.—Mr. F. W. Frohawk exhibited drawings showing the complete life-history of Argynnis aglaia and A. adippe, every stage being figured; also enlarged drawings of the segments of the larva in their first and last stages, showing the remarkable difference in structure.—Mr. G. C. Champion read a paper 'On the Tenebrionidae collected in Australia and Tasmania by Mr. J. J. Walker during the Voyage of H.M. Ship Penguin, with Descriptions of New Genera and Species.'—Mr. J. J. Walker and Col. Swinhoe made some remarks on the paper.—Mr. Champion also read a paper entitled 'An Entomological Excursion to Corsica,' in which he described an expedition to the mountains of that island in May and June, 1893, in company with Mr. R. S. Standen, Col. Yerbury, Mr. Lemann, Mr. Raine, and others.—Mr. O. Salvin, Col. Yerbury, and Col. Swinhoe took part in the discussion which ensued.—Mr. E. Saunders communicated a paper entitled 'A List of Hemiptera-Heteroptera collected by Mr. Champion in Corsica, with a Description of One New Species.'—Mr. W. F. Kirby one entitled 'Notes on Dorydium westwoodi, Buchanan-White, with Observations on the Use of the Name Dorydium,'—and Mr. C. B. Taylor one entitled 'Description of the Larva and Pupa of Papilio homerus, Fab.'

PHILOLOGICAL.—March 2.—Prof. Napier, President, in the chair.—Mr. W. M. Lindsay read a paper 'On the Accentual Element in Early Latin Verse, with a New Theory of the Saturnian Metre.' The Latin accent, he showed, was one mainly of stress, as may be seen from the syncope and reduction of unaccented vowels at all periods of the language, while the Greek accent was one mainly of pitch, though by the beginning of the Christian era the stress element had begun to assert itself. In the Roman imitations of the Greek quantitative metres the Latin accent, owing to its stress character, forced itself into recognition. The reconciliation of accent and metrical ictus in the various species of metres was illustrated, especially the reconciliation of the sentence-accent in the dialogue metres of the early dramatists. The two characteristics of this early Latin poetry are alliteration and regard for accent; hence the probability that the native Latin metre, the Saturnian, was accentual as well as alliterative. The quantitative theory of the Saturnian metre breaks down when applied to the extant lines; in reality the metre is accentual, and its true scheme is:—

A type: $\bar{x}(\bar{x}) \cdot \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x}(\bar{x}) \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x}(\bar{x})$ (or $\bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x}$)
e.g., dābunt mīdium Metēlli | Nādriv pōstas
(or adīctus dēdmī).

B type: $\bar{x}(\bar{x}) \cdot \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x}(\bar{x})$ (or $\bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x} \bar{x}$)
e.g., prīm(a) īnōdīt Cōrēris | Prōspēria pūr
(or Iulias vīrum).

The paper concluded with a statement of Prof. Stengel's derivation of the Romance decasyllable from the Latin Saturnian.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—March 6.—Mr. J. W. Barry, V.P., in the chair.—It was announced that eleven Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members, and twenty-nine candidates had been admitted as Students. The monthly ballot resulted in the election of two Members and thirty-five Associate Members.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—March 5.—Mr. H. Stannus delivered the third lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Decorative Treatment of Traditional Foliage.'

March 6.—Capt. V. Lovett Cameron in the chair.—A paper 'On Travels in the Basin of the Zimbezi' was read before the Foreign and Colonial Section of the Society by M. Foa.

March 7.—Mr. R. B. Carter in the chair.—A paper 'On Refrigerating Apparatus' was read by Prof. C. Linde, of Munich.—A discussion followed.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—March 5.—Sir J. Crichton-Browne, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—Mrs. H. Melchers, Miss H. Russell, Miss Ida Stewart, Sir A. S. Haslam, Hon. L. W. Rothschild, Dr. J. D. Grant, Dr. E. Osbeck, Messrs. E. H. Cardwell, J. Childs, A. T. Hollingsworth, R. T. Mallet, S. A. S. Maud, P. A. Molteni, C. E. S. Phillips, J. C. Scholey, and A. Talbot were elected Members.

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHEOLOGY.—March 6.—Mr. P. le P. Renouf, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by the Rev. G. J. Ball, 'More Glimpses of Babylonian Religion.'

MEETINGS FOR THE ENNING WEEK.

- Mon. Society of Arts, 8.—'The Decorative Treatment of Artificial Foliage,' Lecture IV, Mr. H. Stannus, (Cantor Lecture).
—Geographical, 8.—'Mediterranean and the Border Lands,' Mr. W. H. Cassin-Hardy.
—Institute of British Architects, 8.—'The Streets and Buildings Hill 1894.'
- Tues. Horticultural, 1.
—Royal Institution, 3.—'Locomotion and Finning in Plants and Animals,' Prof. C. Stewart.
—Colonial Institute, 4.
—Civil Engineers, 4.—Further Discussion on 'The Liverpool Overhead Railway' and 'The Electrical Equipment of the Liverpool Overhead Railway.'
- Wed. Architects, 8.—'Early Christian Art in England,' Canon G. F. Brown.
—Anthropological Institute, 8.—'Two Funeral Urns from Loos Choe,' Prof. H. Chamberlain. 'Notes of the Ancient Assyrian and Egyptian,' Mr. C. J. Longman. 'First Impressions of a Primitive Type from Old (pre-Glacial) Hill Gravel in Berkshire,' Mr. G. A. Huxtable.
- Weds. Entomological, 8.—'Temperature Experiments in 1893 on the life of the genus Vanessa and other Lepidoptera,' Mr. P. M. Peck. 'Classification of Hymenoptera Insects,' Mr. W. H. Patton. 'New Species of Muscivora,' Canon Fowler.
—Society of Arts, 8.—'The Yeast and Air Braid,' Mr. C. L. Burdick.
- Thurs. Royal Institution, 3.—'The Vedantic Philosophy,' Prof. Max Müller.
—Geographical, 8.—'The Relations of Geography to History,' Mr. H. J. Macdonald. 'Educational Lecture.' 'How of the Ancient Assyrian and Egyptian,' Mr. C. J. Longman. 'First Impressions of a Primitive Type from Old (pre-Glacial) Hill Gravel in Berkshire,' Mr. G. A. Huxtable.
- Thurs. 8.—'Certain Authentic Epitaphs of Lincoln,' Mr. C. B. Clarke. 'The Improvement of the Midge Canal of the Marston,' Mr. G. Swinburn.
—Antiquaries, 8.—'Silver-gilt Plates of Paris Maki, and an Apocryphal Strainer upon Mr. C. A. Markham. 'The Chapter House of Beverley Minster,' Mr. J. Wilson. 'A Chertic Bricolage at Beverley Minster in the Twelfth Century,' Mr. A. F. Lamb.
- Historical, 8.—'Bosnia and the Villains' Insurrection,' Mr. E. Powell.
—Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts.—Conversations.
- Fri. United Service Institution, 3.—'The Firing Line, and how to keep it Organically Sub-divided to the Last,' Lieut.-Col. H. A. Hall.
- Architectural Association, 7½.—'Modern Architecture in the Past and Future,' Mr. P. E. Maury. 'Old Architecture in the Past and Future,' Mr. T. Moore.
—Civil Engineers, 7.—'Civil Service in the United Kingdom,' Messrs. G. M. Huxtable and J. A. Marks. (Students' Meeting).
—Royal Institution, 8.—'The Scientific Work of Tyndall,' Lord Rayleigh.
- Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—'Light, with Special Reference to the Optical Discoveries of Newton,' Lord Rayleigh.

Science Gossip.

The following arrangements have been made for the meeting of the British Association, which will commence this year on August 8th at Oxford: Presidents of sections—A, Mathematics and Physical Science, Prof. A. W. Rücker; B, Chemistry, Prof. A. B. Dixon; C, Geology, Mr. L. Fletcher; D, Biology, Prof. Bayley Balfour; E, Geography, Capt. Wharton; F, Economic Science and Statistics, Prof. Bastable; G, Mechanical Science, Prof. Kennedy; H, Anthropology, Sir W. H. Flower; I, Physiology, Prof. Schafer. The evening discourses will be delivered by Mr. W. H. White and Prof. J. S. Nicholson. At the meeting of the general committee at Oxford, held for the election of officers, Sir Douglas Galton will be proposed as President of the Association for the meeting at Ipswich in 1895.

The Hakluyt Society will celebrate in its own fashion the anniversary of the birth of Prince Henry the Navigator. We understand that the Council have made arrangements with Mr. C. Raymond Beazley, Fellow of Merton, and Mr. Edgar Prestage, of Balliol College, for a joint edition of Azurara's 'Chronicle of the Discovery of Guinea,' which is the chief authority for the life of the prince.

Messrs. Blackie & Son are going to bring out a new edition of Dechanel's 'Natural Philosophy,' largely rearranged. Prof. Everett has added four entirely new chapters: one on thermodynamics, two dealing with recent investigations in electrical science, and the fourth on systems of coaxial lenses. The number of unworked examples in the optical section has been largely augmented.

Prof. A. LURTON writes:—

"May I beg a few lines of your valuable space to refer to the criticism on my 'Elementary Treatise on the Getting of Minerals'! I have to thank your reviewer for his exceedingly kind remarks on the greater part of my book, and I hope I shall not be thought ungrateful if I reply to some of his criticisms. To one sentence I take a little exception; he refers to the 'self-laudatory' tone of the preface. I do not know to what sentence he refers; is it the appeal 'to the good-natured forbearance of the reader on account of the many shortcomings and imperfections of this little work'? For the rest, the preface, so far as it refers to myself, is merely a statement of facts such as a scientific witness would have to give on entering the witness-box, so that the court might know something as to the witness's experience. Your reviewer alleges the misuse of the term 'vertical.' I dare say he is right. I certainly do not profess grammar, but a careful study of Webster's 'Dictionary' would, I think, lead one of the ordinary public to think that the words 'perpendicular' and 'vertical' might be occasionally used by ordinary men without too strict a reference to their derivation. As a specimen of 'absolute blundering' he objects to the statement that ironstone is commonly found as a stratified rock. Of course he does not deny a fact so well known to every mining man; probably he merely objects to the (I dare say clumsy) phraseology adopted. He appears to object to gas being given, on p. 19, as a mineral not found in Great Britain. As to this I may say that gas is extensively mined by boring in the United States, but, I believe, is not so got in Great Britain. With regard to the ammonites and belemnites of the lias, he does not, of course, deny that they are exceedingly common. He objects that Ammonites humphresianus does not belong to the lias; I suppose he would say it belongs to the lower oolite. He corrects the word 'Ammonite'; but the word 'Humphresianus' is printed in my book on a separate line, and the word 'Ammonites' is implied. I did not think it necessary to print it as it would have made an inconveniently long line (there being three figures in the width of the page). He is very severe upon fig. 10, objecting to granite being put 'at one end at the base of all things'; but if it were put in the section at all whereabouts would he put it? He objects to the miocene as a thick division between the eocene and pliocene, at the other end of the section. I would plead as regards the thickness of the miocene that it is little more than enough to indicate its presence. The section is an attempt to show graphically the order of the various strata, and in that respect it merely substitutes the form of the longitudinal section for the vertical (and equally imaginary) section, so frequently adopted by geologists of the first rank. I have before me a vertical section prepared by Sir Andrew Ramsay, lately Director of the Geological Survey, in which he puts granite at the bottom, and the miocene between the pliocene and eocene at the other extremity. I may say that Mr. Jukes-Browne, in his 'Handbook' dated 1892, classes granite among the 'original' rocks. I suggest that as a matter of fact, in walking across Great Britain, a man would pass over the outcrops of the various formations in the order and manner somewhat roughly indicated in fig. 10, beginning with the granite of Wales or Cornwall, and passing over the Cambrian, Silurian, old red, carboniferous, Permian, new red, lias, oolite, chalk, and ending with the tertiary on the Eastern coast, and that there are intrusive igneous rocks both in Leicestershire and Derbyshire, as indicated in Fig. 10 about the centre of the section."

We scarcely expect to convince Prof. Lupton that his preface is "self-laudatory," but a perpetual fully confirms our opinion that it is so. It is one thing to enumerate one's titles to fame under compulsion in the witness-box, and quite another to do so where no compulsion exists. We still maintain that "vertical" and "perpendicular" are not convertible terms; that iron does not occur as a stratified rock, though ironstone often does; that neither "gas" nor "potassium" (concerning which Prof. Lupton is discreetly silent in his letter) can properly be described as minerals mined anywhere; that although ammonites and belemnites abound in the lias, they are not characteristic of it, though certain species of them are; that the particular species selected for illustration, being an oolitic form, is most unsuitable for its purpose, and that the name of that form is Humphreianus, and not "Humphreianus." A more serious matter is the section which Prof. Lupton now asks us to regard merely as the ordinary table of formations drawn longitudinally instead of vertically. We cannot so regard it, because in his book Prof. Lupton describes it as an "ideal sketch, showing section of English strata," and emphasizes that description by lettering it as running from west to east. In such a section the granite, therefore, is placed at the base of the entire stratified series, not at all in the sense in which it occupies that position in Sir Andrew Ramsay's column. Any student would understand from Prof. Lupton's section that the granite of the west of England was older than the pre-Cambrian, and could not understand anything else. Mr. Jukes-Browne we leave to take care of himself. Prof. Lupton does not seem to know that the existence of any miocene in Britain is now denied by many geologists, and that it would be a very circuitous route indeed that would enable him to cross the beds which at one time were so called in his walk from Cornwall or Wales to the Eastern Counties. We regret that the desire to pass lightly over the weak points of a good book should have rendered our brief criticisms less intelligible to the author than they ought to have been.

FINE ARTS

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.

(Seventh and Concluding Notice.)

NEGLECTING, for the present, Van Eyck and one or two other "primitives," we begin with Paolo Uccello as the earliest in date of the painters to be criticized in Gallery IV. In the Cassone Fronts (Nos. 157 and 165) attributed to him, which Mr. C. Butler has lent to the Academy, there is nothing of any kind which specially marks them as the works of the master. As usual, these fronts are not really pictures, but panels enriched with a congeries of incidents. Whoever painted them, we, not being bound to find out the name of the artist, gladly admit that they abound in curious matters of detail, and they are literally crowded with incidents of martial life in Italy during Uccello's time, i.e., c. 1450. If we fail to find evidence for calling them by his name, still stronger are our doubts about the beautiful, spirited, and finely painted, nearly life-size Portrait of a Youth (170) being—as the Catalogue, following the distinguished owner, says it is—by that far greater artist Tommaso Guidi, commonly called Masaccio. Much injured as it has been and indifferently repaired, this head of a handsome young Italian wearing a red cap and red dress, such as the middle classes of Florence wore in the fifteenth century, seems to belong to a later hand than Masaccio's. It appears to us more likely to be by Botticelli, who was born nearly fifty years after Masaccio. To him we should be inclined to refer it, on the grounds on which the 'Portrait of a Young Man,' from the Northwick Collection, finely etched by M. L. Flameng, and No. 626 in the National Gallery, which, technically speaking, it much resembles, has now received the name of Botticelli instead of that of Masaccio.

St. Jerome (183), from the Northbrook Collection, bears the name of Antonello da Messina, and has also been ascribed to J. Van Eyck, Memline, and Albert Dürer. The claims of the latter three may be dismissed at once, although those of Van Eyck and Memline are at least plausible, while Dürer is simply out of the question. No doubt the surface has acquired by lapse of time, and perhaps by incidence of varnish, a deeper tone than when it left the easel of the painter, whoever he was. But for this circumstance the Bellinesque qualities of the picture—for instance, its extreme brightness, and those elements of it which are strongly Venetian, such as the birds flying and sitting, especially the quail and the peacock which are in the foreground—would indicate Venice as this work's birthplace. Its coloration at large as well as its local colours are decidedly Venetian. These circumstances are, of course, in favour of Antonello; and so is the fact that so long ago as 1529—that is, thirty-six years after his death—it was in the possession of Antonio Pasqualino at Venice, and thought to be by Antonello; others, however, thought it was Van Eyck's, to whom half the ancient quasi-Flemish pictures of this sort used to be attributed. Nor were there wanting those who ascribed it to Jacopo de' Barbari. Nowadays, when we know next to nothing of the painted work of the last-named artist, such an idea would be a mere guess. At the beginning of the sixteenth century his work may have been better known. There is a curious note about the picture in Dr. Waagen's 'Art and Artists in England,' 1838, iii. 43. Through a sort of framework of stone we look under a Gothic arch into a room which is paved in a geometrical pattern with variously coloured marbles and vaulted with stone. The wall facing us is pierced above by three Gothic windows; below on our left a square window affords a view of a brilliant sunlit landscape, a river, a boat containing two rowers, and a flower garden, where a finely-clad lady in black is walking with a white dog at her side; on the other side of the water is a man in a red dress, while in the mid-distance roads lead across some fields to a castle and a walled-in church, and further off lies a second enclosed garden. The prospect extends to where two horsemen are riding side by side, and is closed by lofty hills. The painting of this minute landscape is of the most amazing brilliance, finish, and delicacy; no illumination in miniature ever excelled it, while the representation of daylight without the vaulted chamber and reflected from the shining floor within is supremely true. On our right of the room an open archway reveals a sort of vaulted cloister divided into two alleys by a range of slender columns, and between their shafts the splendid view without is again seen through an open window. In the nearer aisle St. Jerome's lion is walking towards us. On the window-sills are several small birds, while more birds are flying in the sunny air outside. They are all designed with spirit and exquisitely touched. Still more delicately painted is the most important personage of the picture, St. Jerome, seated before a desk, and wearing his red mantle, skull cap, and white rochet; his cardinal's hat lies upon a wooden coffer near his chair, which is raised upon a movable dais or platform of brown wood, while behind him rises a sort of dressoir of two shelves, where are books, a bottle, probably for ink, a basket, and other articles, one of which looks like a pounce box. A second dressoir, holding books, &c., faces the saint. On his desk lies a manuscript volume, a leaf of which he is about to turn over, while his grave expression indicates the seriousness of his thoughts. On the nearer edge of the platform are a dozing cat, an earthenware pot filled with pinks, and another pot where a miniature orange tree is growing. All these details, as well as the painted frame of stone, are on a panel measuring 18 in. by 14 in. The verisimilitude of every part of the picture is marvellously fine and solid; the imitation of the textures, colours, and light and shade of every stone, woven fabric, or piece of wood is so faithful and searching that it seems as if the human eye and touch could no further go. All the while the picture is broad, massive, and luminous as a Titian, and there is not the least lack of harmony in its vigorous colours and tones. Apart from the mention of Pasqualino in the sixteenth century we know nothing of the history of this extraordinary piece until, as an Albert Dürer, it was in the possession of Sir Thomas Baring at Stratton. At the sale of that collector in June, 1843, it was purchased for 139*l.* 13*s.*; and the late Mr. Baring bought it again in June, 1849, for 162*l.* 15*s.* It was called a Van Eyck at the British Institution in 1845 (No. 66); and at the Academy in 1871 it was again attributed to Van Eyck, and called 'A Philosopher in his Study.' Wonder as it is, no visitor to Gallery IV. now takes the trouble to look at it. What may be called the subject, or incident, of this painting is probably St. Jerome in a lecture hall, where he is preparing to address an audience of students. The apartment is manifestly not a "study," or scriptorium of a monastery, but a place accessible for public purposes to any number of persons, who might be addressed from the raised platform.

Giovanni Bellini has the credit of having painted the Virgin and Child (142), but it is impossible for us to ascribe to him or to any of his school this fine picture. The noble face of the mother is of a highly sensitive type; indeed, the tremulous lips and the anxious eyes with which she regards the Infant Christ are particularly touching. The picture is intact, or nearly so. No. 143, Virgin and Child, with Saints and Angels, has better claims to bear Bellini's name, but it seems to us much more like a Cima, being too weak and nerveless for Bellini, and yet more elegant than his work. The signature goes for nothing. The design is a replica of the middle of a picture in the sacristy of the church of the Redemptor at Venice, traditionally assigned to Bellini, and certainly more like his work than that before us, which is, in fact, hardly good enough for Cima, though we have nothing more plausible to propose. We do not believe for a moment that Catena painted it, as a well-known dilettante has declared. Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle suggest Boasolo as the artist of the Venetian original. The prodigious finish of St. Jerome (145) (which is lent by a collector who will not allow his name to be published in the Catalogue, or in that of the New Gallery), its brightness, hardness, and glowing illumination, and a certain thinness in the workmanship, go far, but not quite far enough, to justify its ascription to Giovanni Bellini. It is not, however, difficult to believe that so various a master had to do with it, and, obviously enough, it possesses several of his technical qualities, among them an extremely quaint design, very brown half-tones, laborious drawing, a thin impasto, and much ruddiness in the carnations of the half-naked saint, who sits at the entrance of his cave in a limestone cliff. By Mantegna, or possibly, but not probably, by another hand, Mr. Butler's Virgin and Child (148), a curious and passionate design, is extraordinarily highly finished, and somewhat heavily touched in Mantegna's way, opaque in its tints, harsh in its definitions and laboured in its details, which are rather Venetian than like Mantegna's work. The coloration, too, and local colours are very like those of a Venetian painter. On the other hand, Mantegna's quaintness, some of his statue-like stiffness, and defective draughtsmanship are perceptible in the picture.

No doubt by Cima, barring some unlucky repaintings, is the full-length and nearly life-size single figure (150) of The Saviour (of which there is another version at Dresden, No. 215, there falsely signed "Giovanni Bellini") which Mr. Butler has lent, not for the first time, if our memory can be trusted. Christ is an impressive figure, with His right hand raised in the attitude of benediction, and holding in the other hand the book of the new Dispensation, while at His side appears the emblematic fig-tree. The statue-like dignity and suavity of this design are enhanced by the large and simple style, and especially by the massive breadth and simplicity of the simple red robe which extends from head to foot, and possesses many of the qualities of the purer class of antique draperies. The background is a landscape, the New Jerusalem being introduced on a hill in the mid-distance, and the Faithful, represented as sheep in a meadow, are placed nearer the foreground. The coloration and illumination, vivid as they are, are distinctly Venetian, and the face would be finer but for the darkening, due, we think, to a bad restoration of the shadows there and the harshness of their edges as opposed to the lighter parts of the flesh. We are not prepared to deny that this may be a fine old copy of a Cima. The Virgin and Child, Lord Northbrook's contribution, No. 153, bears the name of Crivelli, on a label at the foot of the design, as he was wont to put it, and, although there is something of Mantegna's cramped attitudes in both the figures, it possesses Crivelli's more charming qualities. The Virgin is dainty, but rather affected. The Oriental patterns of the embroideries on her robe of deep blue, which is so neatly fitted to her shape, are delightful, and the painting of the garlands of fruit in the background is marvellous. The cardellino in Christ's hand is characteristic of pictures of this class and time; the lean and rather stiff fingers of the Virgin point to this being a work of Crivelli's youth. The house-fly crawling on the top of the balustrade in front of the picture is an illustration of what human patience and exquisite care and skill can achieve. See Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle's 'North Italy,' i. 92. Dr. Waagen noticed the inferior execution and want of expression in the face of Christ—defects which confirm our suspicion that this is a youthful piece, much influenced by Mantegna. It was No. 235 in the Academy of 1870, and was bought for the Baring Collection in 1852 for 157l. 10s. at the sale of Mr. Jones, of Clytha.

We turn with pleasure to Mr. L. Mond's Mother and Child (110), which, pretty and voluptuous as its coloration is, and animated as is the action of the boy whom the fair matron is suckling in so natural a manner, can hardly be admitted to be a Titian. The accomplished, broad, and masterly Flute-Player (117), by Savoldo, which charms the visitor by the suffusion, softness, and delicacy of the painting of the gentle face, might easily be mistaken for a work of the generation following Savoldo's, when the works of Bellini had almost become antiquities and Raphael was mature. The Brescian master is less honoured in this country than his merits deserve, and those merits were so great and his style was so masculine that we should have little difficulty in ascribing to him the grave, vigorous, and learned, but heavily, if not unskillfully repainted Portrait of a Senator (115), a half-length, life-size figure of an elderly man in black and white robes, with a black haretta on his head, and holding some papers in his right hand, about which he seems to be going to speak. This fine portrait was No. 87 here in 1871, and then bore the title of 'Lorenzo Pucci,' Cardinal di San Quattro, under which name it had, without complete authority, long been known. It was then, as now, attributed to Raphael, an attribution few modern critics venture to support. It is Passavant's No. 296 (see 'Raphael d'Urbino,' Paris, 1860, ii. 358), and by him relegated to a category of doubtful pictures ascribed to Raphael. No one has challenged the doubts of the great critic, and few who see it here will hesitate to say that, unless a fine work of Raphael's lie under the late repaints, it is none of his. When it is first mentioned it was in the Casali Palace at Bologna, and subsequently it belonged to M. Rossi of that city, who sent it to England, where it was bought by the late Sir R. Gordon, and after his death in 1857 became the property of the present Duke of Abercorn. An unquestionable Del Piombo is the grandiose Holy Family (113) from the Northbrook Gallery, which was No. 7 at the British Institution, 1816, and No. 63 in the same place, 1840; No. 161 at Manchester in 1857; and No. 130 at the Academy in 1870. It was bought in 1808 by Le Brun, the French dealer, from the Cambiaso Palace at Genoa, and in 1810 it was exhibited by him in Paris, and afterwards sent to London, where, in or about 1811, it was bought by Sir T. Baring, who in 1843 sold it (?) to Mr. Coningham; we next hear of it as purchased in 1849 for 1,890l. by Lord Northbrook. The critics have united in admiring this noble piece, where the ornate style of Michael Angelo and Venetian coloration are combined with a massive and powerful chiaroscuro to which neither Buonarroti himself nor any of the followers of Bellini except Titian had attained at the time it was painted, which, as Waagen remarks, must have been about 1518, when 'The Raising of Lazarus' was executed. It is of the same stamp as the 'Lazarus,' and, in its limited way, quite equal to it. The "leadens shade" (or greenish-bronze colour of the shadows) which the authors of 'Painting in Italy' noticed in, we are persuaded, due to changes in the pigments employed, or to the ground painting "coming through" the surface colours. The green curtain Sebastiano affected for his backgrounds, the stately contours of the figures, the slight tendency to exaggeration in their attitudes, the magnificent morbidezze of the nude parts, and the noble face of the Virgin are all characteristic of Del Piombo's art at its finest. The figure of the donor, a rather mean-looking civilian, is, of course, a portrait, and the picture is in fine preservation. Sebastiano's taste for life-size and half-length figures is traceable here, as in his excellent work at Alnwick, which we described in 'The Private Collections of England,' as well as in various pictures of his in continental galleries.

A very different sort of art, less intellectual and stately in its motives, appears when we turn to the so-called Bonifazio Veronese's Chariot of Day (106), a school picture of no great account. Paris Bordone is usually a welcome painter, but Christ among the Doctors (114) does not interest us deeply, although it bears his name, perhaps rightly. It is weak, loosely composed, and pedantic; and yet the presentation of the subject is dramatic, while the design, though improbable, is clever. The boy Christ is a pretty figure, but the decline of art betrays itself in the trivialities of the work and its poverty as a whole. Paolo Veronese's name may reasonably be given to the sparkling and richly coloured, but somewhat artificial Flight of Europa (105), although it would not be very unjust to ascribe it to a rather weak member of his school. Whoever be its author, it is a capital illustration of the handiwork (we prefer this term to "art") of that "bottoga" which turned out so much sumptuous decoration of this kind. Learned botanists persist in gravely writing to us to demonstrate that the jonquils are not only anachronisms, but impossible in the season indicated by the darkening autumnal foliage. The coloration is lovely; the carnations and morbidezze of the ladies are charming; the sky is of a delightful azure, relieved with golden-tinted clouds. When there is so much that is beautiful and suitable to the subject, what does it matter if the design of the figures is childish and the botany all wrong? It is of more consequence that the picture, though still harmonious and homogeneous, has darkened a good deal.

A finer and more sincere kind of art is represented by the Portrait of a Lady (108), a noble specimen of Bronzino, and in complete preservation, while its draughtsmanship and the modelling of the face and hands are of Bronzino's best. It was No. 67 in the Academy of 1860.

Parmigiano is well represented by Mr. C. Morrison's Holy Family (116), in which the Virgin is seated under a tree, holding the Infant by His arm, while He is supported by St. Catherine, and turns towards St. John, who stands on our left with his hands clasped. The female figure in the clouds is doubtless intended for that of the Virgin after her assumption. Double appearances of this sort are not uncommon in Italian art of every epoch. An admirable example of Parmigiano's taste when treating this theme as a genre subject, the picture is characteristic of the motives prevalent in the art of Middle Italy during the second quarter of the sixteenth century, which, with all their prettiness and suavity when in cultured hands, were sure to degenerate when emotional designers like the Procaccini and their scholars and like the Caracci or Guercino came into vogue. In pictures such as this and Nos. 106 and 112, the majesty of design discoverable in the Sebastiano, No. 113, and the Cima, No. 160, has disappeared, and sacred art become a simple matter of cultivation, and, at the best, good taste. Yet the landscape is charmingly poetical; the blue hills and far-stretching plains are distinctly instances of deep feeling for noble scenery. In fact, No. 116 is a noteworthy and comparatively early example of this rare and noble quality. There is overmuch sweetness in the really beautiful Adoration of the Shepherds (119), by Ludovico Caracci, a cabinet picture on copper which Lord Northbrook has lent, and which reminds us of the 'Notto' of Correggio in the most striking manner, while, with the most skillful technique, it exhibits eclecticism in its most graceful stage. The luminous figure of the Infant Christ is directly borrowed from Correggio, and so are some of the local colours of the dresses. Even the sentiment (which is truly charming) of the landscape is partially due to him, although in some respects it stands alone as a striking instance of the not fully recognized genius of the Caracci, especially Ludovico, for employing landscape as a vehicle for pathetic expression. In this respect it would be hard to say how much Elzheimer and Claude owed to Ludovico. Apart from these fine elements it must nevertheless be owned by all who look at this beautiful piece of eclecticism that its charms are allied to those of art in "Annals" and "Keepsakes." It was No. 64, and was called 'The Nativity,' at the British Institution in 1816, and it has not been exhibited since. Far more masculine, heavily and rather crudely painted, and not without that underlying strain of vulgarity we associate with the Bassano family, is Mr. Morrison's Adoration of the Shepherds (111), by Leandro Bassano, one of the latest of Titian's followers. It is an exceptionally careful, solid, and luminous effort, and some points in it have led critics to conjecture that it is a later copy of a work by one of the best of the Bassanos. However this may be, it is infinitely to be preferred to pictures of the next century.

Mr. Morrison's Claude, No. 109, finely represents a master we always reckon with the Italians. It depicts the story of Europa in a vein astonishingly different from that of Veronese in No. 106. No one who looks at this and similar Claudes can for a moment doubt that Keats read the antique legends in Claude's mood. 'The Enchanted Castle,' which was here a few years ago, he had seen at the British Institution in 1818, and that gallery, much frequented by his friends—Haydon, for instance, Hazlitt, and Lamb—had from its opening in 1813 till 1819, two years before his death, exhibited fourteen very fine Claudes. The sweet romantic landscape before us is quite in Keats's vein. The sky could not be finer, and the effect of warm and silvery daylight is delightful and harmonious. The picture was painted in 1658 for M. Courtois, in Smith's No. 144, and, he tells us, resembles in its subject and some general features the Queen's 'Rape of Europa' (Smith 136, and R.A. 1876, No. 88), a picture which Vivares engraved (Smith 111), and his No. 206, a drawing by Claude engraved by Earlom (vol. iii. of the 'Liber Veritatis'). Lady Dilke's 'Claude Lorrain,' Paris, 1884, mentions No. 144 of the original drawings in the 'Liber Veritatis' as referring to this picture. The drawing fairly represents the design. The 'Europa' now before us was brought to England in 1831 by M. Laneville, who sold it for 600*l.*, and it was No. 128 at the Academy in 1879. Dr. Waagen rightly wrote of it: "This exquisite specimen is in the most perfect state of preservation. The outline of the land is that seen from the neighbourhood of Terracina, with Circe's Promontory in the distance." Lovers of Claude will remember that in 1658 the master painted for the Prince Chigi the 'Sinon before Priam,' now No. 6 in the National Gallery, which, whether owing to the varnish or the badness of the air in the Gallery, is much less limpid, silvery, cool, and pure than it used to be, and is at the present time far less precious in these respects than this 'Europa.'

The interesting views of Dredan (Nos. 107 and 122) by B. Bellotto, bright, solid, and hard, are the last of the Italian pictures we have to mention, and we may end by speaking of a few others which we have omitted to notice earlier. The first is the exquisitely finished Virgin and Child (180) attributed to J. Van Eyck, which Lorth Northbrook bought from M. Nieuwenhuys in 1857, and lent to the Academy in 1872 as No. 234. We are not quite convinced that Van Eyck painted this thoroughly good picture, although most of the best authorities admit its claims. It appears to us somewhat over soft and delicate for the strong hand of that master, and its shadows seem to be blacker than his generally were. Apart from this it is a capital example of a fine school, excellent in feeling and taste, exquisite in its finish and preservation, and wonderfully drawn and modelled. To the "Netherlands School" Lord Northbrook ascribes his Mabuse-like Virgin and Child (172), which Waagen called a Mabuse; it is a group full of colour and tone, and distinguished by exceptional softness and finish. It was here in 1872, No. 229. To Mabuse is rightly awarded the same generous owner's Virgin and Child Enthroned (179), which is a marvel of finish, while the way in which the Child embraces His mother, and her manner of holding and looking down at Him, are most tender. It is, Mr. Weale says, a replica of a picture given in 1558 by the magistrates of Louvain to Philip II., and preserved in the Escorial. It demands, like the last, the most attentive study. Among other noteworthy pictures in Gallery IV. are Tobit and the Angel (156), by Filippino; Melozzo da Forlì's curious and unbecomingly Federigo da Guidobaldi, first Duke of Urbino (161), from Windsor; and the extravagant, yet powerful and original, Call of St. Matthew (184), which was here in 1872 as No. 239, and formerly was attributed, reasonably enough, to Quentin Matsys, but is now identified by help of a

On concluding our review it only remains for us to thank the generous owners who have furnished these galleries with so many interesting works, as well as the Academicians who were mostly concerned in getting them together.

THE LATEST ACQUISITION OF THE GHIZEH MUSEUM.

THE latest important acquisition of the Ghizeh Museum is, from an artistic point of view, one of the most valuable objects yet discovered in the Nile Valley. It consists of an ebony door, and part of another, found by M. Naville at Dayr-el-Bahari. On one side are represented, in low relief, bands of Tate and symbolical knots, and beneath a dado of simple geometrical pattern. The reverse contains two registers of sculpture, in low relief, of Thothmes II. worshipping Ammon Ra, with a dado below. Remarkable historical interest pertains to these bas-reliefs, as the figure of Ammon Ra is erased throughout, and, from the reckless hacking, by the hands of a most violent iconoclast. The first, and probably correct, explanation of the mutilation which arises in the mind is that it was perpetrated by Khuenaten when he endeavoured to suppress the worship of Ammon. The destruction could scarcely have been the work of early Arab invaders, since they would not have allowed the figure of the king to remain, and it is improbable that the first Christians would have wreaked their vengeance on the god alone, leaving pagan symbols to remain. Besides the above subjects there are bands of hieroglyphic inscriptions, bearing the cartouches of Thothmes II.

Regarded from a technical point of view, the execution is a marvel of wood-carving, and the exquisite rendering of the low relief is a triumph that perhaps only a sculptor can adequately appreciate. One naturally recalls the more celebrated examples of doors on which the skill of the artist has been lavished: in metal, the Assyrian gates in the British Museum, the doors of Monreale, of Amalfi, and other Byzantine work; in wood, the work of the Italian Renaissance, like the doors in the Palace at Urbino; and we think that for noble purity of style the general voice would award the palm to this eighteenth dynasty Egyptian wood-carving. The question arises, Were the doors (they were folding) originally seen as ebony, or were they plated with metal, gold or silver? A careful examination of the surface shows it to be covered with plugged holes, that attach the panels to cross-bars inside the framework, also ebony. But these, or some of them, might have been used to attach the metal to the surface. Again, one may be allowed to doubt whether the tops of the pegs would have been allowed to appear if the wood was to remain bare. Another weighty reason in favour of silver or gold will be found in the scheme of coloration of the temple of Dayr-el-Bahari, which still remains visible in parts. It is exceedingly bright and light in key, and the black ebony, although splendid in itself, and when seen in the chamber of a museum, would scarcely have harmonized with the general polychromatic effect. Dr. Brugsch supposes the doors belonged to a tabernacle of the temple; the height of one is about 6 ft. by 4 ft., the other is only represented by a panel.

Considering that the fund for the exploration of Dayr-el-Bahari is subscribed in England (the subscribers, therefore, having presented this matchless work of art to the museum), it would be only a graceful act of the direction to present a plaster cast of the door to South Kensington Museum. We beg to suggest Kensington because its special instructive value is to art students; and there also it would not be likely to be covered with oil paint, as the casts at the British Museum. It would, of course, be no offence to taste to stain the plaster the colour of the original. M.

Naville is to be congratulated on bringing to light a work of art which, if it will not rival the popularity of the Sheikh-el-beled, will be equally valued by the artist and connoisseur.

Fine-Art Society.

As the scaffolding which impedes the view from the ground level of Mr. W. B. Richmond's mosaics in the vault of St. Paul's is not yet removed, and we some months ago described them at length as they appeared from the scaffold, we must postpone for the present further comments on these important and, so far as we yet know, beautiful and appropriate decorations. Our readers are already in possession of their iconography.

An exhibition of works of art is to be opened at Salford on the 16th of April, towards which numerous contributions have been promised from Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and other important towns.

REFERRING to our having wished him "many happy returns" of his birthday, Mr. Watts writes:—

"I am, I am sorry to say, seventy-seven [not seventy-six]. I should like to have this put right, for I wish to prove that 'it is never too late to mend,' and that at an advanced age one may go on trying to improve. This I hope my work this year will establish."

An interesting discovery has been made at Wells in the burying-ground east of the cloister and south of the cathedral church. The "chapel of Our Lady beside the cloister," rebuilt by Bishops Stillington and King during the second half of the fifteenth century, stood here until its destruction in 1560, and the greater part of its west end remains against the cloister wall. It has been supposed until now, from former investigations, to have been a rectangular chapel of three bays, but recent researches have shown beyond doubt that this was but the nave or ante-chapel of a large cruciform building about 120 ft. long, with large octagonal turrets at each end of the transept. From fragments of the bosses that were found during the earlier excavations, its fan vault must have been of very remarkable character, and one of the finest of its kind. Beneath the foundations of the later chapel have been found those of another of much earlier date, but built at a totally different angle. Part of the tiled flooring of this remains in place. The investigations are not yet completed, and several interesting points have still to be cleared up.

We offer as a suggestion to the very painstaking compilers of the catalogue of works which may be contributed to the Academy exhibition of next winter, that one sequence of numbers should be used for the entire collection instead of two, as this year, or, as before, three sequences. The simpler plan would save trouble, and prevent mistakes and confusion.

AMONG the artistic events of April next will be the opening, in the Gallery of the Fine-Art Society, of collections of drawings—by Mr. F. Goodall, of views in Egypt, and by Mrs. Allingham, of views in England, chiefly in the Home Counties.

MR. ARMITAGE confirms the report that he has joined "the noble army of Retired Academicians." He does so partly on account of the long and serious illness of Mrs. Armitage and partly because he is in his seventy-seventh year. The favourite pupil of Delaroche, selected by that master to help him in painting the "Hémicycle" at the Beaux-Arts, Paris, Mr. Armitage, who was born in London in May, 1817, began to exhibit at the Academy in 1840, and consequently needs no apology for quitting the active ranks of his profession. Since 1848, when he contributed to the Academy 'Henry VIII. and Katherine Parr' and 'Trafalgar' (the death of Nelson), Mr. Armitage has been an almost constant contributor. He has not exhibited elsewhere in London, except at Westminster Hall, where in 1843 he won one of the three first prizes of 300*l.* each with a cartoon of 'Cæsar's First Invasion of Britain,' the other two falling to Mr. G. F. Watts and the late Mr. C. W. Cope. Of the ten winners of prizes on this occasion Mr. Armitage, Mr. Watts, and Mr. J. C. Horsley survive. Ten additional prizes were awarded to as many painters, of whom only Messrs. F. R. Pickersgill and W. Cave Thomas have not joined the majority. To the second contest in Westminster Hall, that of 1844, Mr. Armitage contributed a cartoon, an encaustic painting, and two frescoes, but won no prize. In 1845, in the third competition, he obtained a premium of 200*l.* with a cartoon of 'The Spirit of Religion,' a sketch of the same in colours, and a portion of it painted in fresco. The other winners of 200*l.* premiums were Mr. (now Sir) J. Noel Paton and Mr. John Tenniel, who has since then covered himself with glory in association with Mr. Punch. In 1847 Mr. Armitage obtained yet another prize, being 500*l.*, with an oil picture of 'The Battle of Meenae,' as did also Messrs. Watts and F. R. Pickersgill. For many years after this the painter's career was one of uninterrupted distinction; he produced frescoes at Westminster Palace, St. John's Church, Duncan Terrace, Lalington, and University Hall, Gordon Square, and, in oil, he painted 'The Burial of a Martyr,' 'Abolibah,' 'The Mother of Moses,' 'Ahab and Jezebel,' and 'St. John leading home the Virgin.' In 1867 he was elected an A.R.A. and in 1872.

THE Municipal Art Society of New York invites artists, without distinction of age or sex, to compete for the decoration of the Court Room of Oyer and Terminer in the city of New York. A jury of fifteen members—including, among those who are known on this side of the Atlantic, Messrs. R. M. Hunt, L. C. Tiffany, H. G. Marquand, and F. D. Millet—will judge the works sent in, and decide on the amount to be awarded to each successful candidate. Five thousand dollars are devoted to the decorations, which are to comprise historical or allegorical compositions, or both, in three panels, while the rest of the walls may be decorated in flat tints, figures, or ornaments, at the discretion of the artists. Sketches must be sent to Mr. E. H. Bell, 215, West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, on or before the 15th prox.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Popular Concerts.
PRINCES' HALL.—Mr. Algernon Ashton's Concert.

A somewhat curious programme was offered at the Crystal Palace last Saturday, and the total absence of works generally deemed attractive accounted for the small audience. The symphony was Beethoven's Haydnesque work in c, No. 1, the other orchestral items being Wagner's 'Faust' Overture and Liszt's symphonic poem 'Les Préludes.' Herr Hugo Becker brought forward for the first time Haydn's Concerto in d for violoncello, one of six works of this nature left by the genial old master. Scored merely for strings, oboes, and horns, the concerto is thoroughly unpretentious, and presents no features calling for special note, though, of course, it is tuneful and unaffected. An item marked "first time of performance" was a ballad for orchestra, entitled 'The Legend of Excalibur,' by Mr. Walter Weschê. Suggested, of course, by Sir Thomas Malory's 'Morte d'Arthur' and Tennyson's treatment of the legend, the work, we are told, is not to be regarded exactly as programme music, the themes having no precise significance, though the music is, of course, intended to illustrate in a general sense the Arthurian fable. The piece is in three sections, and is well written and picturesquely scored, though not particularly powerful nor original. It was received with a fair amount of favour. A first appearance at the Palace was made by Mlle. Rose Olitzka, who gave a vigorous rendering of Beethoven's "Ah! perfido," and was heard to greater advantage in songs by Grieg and Schumann.

The Beethoven programme offered at the Popular Concert last Saturday afternoon does not call for lengthy notice. The instrumental works presented were the early Sonata in e flat, Op. 7, quietly, but intelligently played by Miss Fanny Davies; the Quintet in c, Op. 29; and the 'Kreutzer' Sonata, for piano and violin, Op. 47, in which Miss Davies was joined by Herr Joachim. Miss Fillunger contributed three of the Bonn master's Lieder, and displayed much artistic feeling. On Monday Dvorák's Pianoforte Trio in b flat, Op. 21, was added to the repertory of these concerts. The opus numbers assigned to the published works of the Bohemian composer are more than usually arbitrary, but beyond all question the b flat Trio is an early work, and is not particularly characteristic, though in other respects it is entitled to regard; as the programme annotator well observes, "the use of thematic material shows rigid economy, and the subjects proper are so worked as to make recourse to episodic padding quite unnecessary." Still there are some singular changes of tonality in the course of the four movements, although the rules of form are fairly well observed. It is unlikely that the trio will become popular, for it is wanting in distinctiveness, but it is certainly worthy of occasional performance; for if the marks of originality are not very distinct, the music is from first to last genial, unlaboured, and melodious. The work received full justice from Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Herr Joachim, and Herr Becker. Schubert's glorious Quintet for strings in c, Op. 163, commenced the programme; Miss Zimmermann played some Scarlatti movements with effect; and Herr Joachim gave Bach's unaccompanied Violin Sonata in e, omitting the final movement without any specified reason. The practice of presenting works in mutilated fashion is increasing, and should be deprecated. Miss Dale was again the vocalist, and sang airs by Mendelssohn, Schubert, and Schumann with so much taste that she will in all probability gain permanent favour at these concerts.

Mr. Algernon Ashton is one of those earnest and industrious musicians who take as their motto the proverb, "Virtue is its own reward." Disdaining the cheap applause of the vulgar majority, he labours in the highest fields of art, and is doubtless satisfied with the esteem and appreciation of a select circle. The concert of his own compositions on Wednesday evening was well attended. It commenced with a recently written Sonata in a for pianoforte and violin, in which Mr. Ashton was assisted by Mr. Richard Gompertz. It is an extremely musicianly, if not very melodious work, the middle movement being the most pleasing of the three. Four "Lively Pieces" for pianoforte and violoncello, also composed last year, are lighter in texture, and were received with much favour, the violoncellist being that able artist Mr. W. H. Squire. The principal vocal item was a lengthy ballad, 'The Horseman and the Boden Sea,' finely sung by Mr. William Paull, who possesses an excellent baritone voice. Five other songs were contributed by Miss Marjorie Eaton, and the programme included a set of three English Dances for pianoforte duet, Op. 10, and a Pianoforte Quartet in c minor. Alike in his instrumental and vocal compositions, Mr. Algernon Ashton exhibits strong leanings towards the modern German school, and this renders his music somewhat difficult to grasp at a first hearing. Miss Edith O. Greenhill and Mr. Alfred Hobday took part in the concert.

Musical Society.

THERE is much agitation on foot at present with reference to the registration of teachers in music. The matter is one of considerable difficulty, because it does not necessarily follow that a good musician must be a good preceptor, and the method by which teachers should be legally authorized to exercise their calling invites much discussion. But musicians evidently think the time has come for action, and Sir John Stainer, who as Oxford Professor is well qualified, has placed himself at the head of the movement, and will preside at a conference in London on April 26th.

THE experiment of performing the 'Requiem' from Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' in association with Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' at the Albert Hall on Thursday last week did not prove particularly successful in a popular sense, the audience being decidedly below the average. The oratorio public does not care for fragments, and the sensuous strains to which Rossini has wedded the ancient Latin hymn are losing their hold on amateurs. The performance of both selections was unexceptionable as regards Sir Joseph Barnby's choir. Of the soloists Miss Marie Brema and Mr. Watkin Mills were the most meritorious, but Mrs. Elene Eaton's fine soprano voice told well in the huge building. Herr van Bandrowaki, a German artist from Frankfurt, sang with fair effect in the German style, his engagement being presumably due to the circumstance that no English tenor worthy to sing at a performance of the Royal Choral Society was available.

THE concert-room performance of Gounod's 'Faust' in the Queen's Hall last Saturday afternoon was in the main successful. As regards the representatives of the principal characters, Mr. Lloyd as Faust, Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli as Margaret (printed in the programme as "Margarita"), and Mr. Santley sang in a manner almost wholly satisfying; and two young vocalists, Miss Rosa Green (from America) and Mr. Harrison Brockbank, fully justified their engagement, the former rendering Siebel's airs with effect, and the latter displaying not only an excellent baritone voice but much artistic intelligence as Valentine. Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted with more than ordinary success, his reading of the work being entirely acceptable. Some unimportant cuts were made, but the ballet movements were played.

OTHER operatic recitals are to follow at the Queen's Hall, and we understand that Sir Augustus Harris, who holds the performing rights in Wagner's later music dramas as regards the United Kingdom, intends to give some performances of these works in the new concert-room during the season.

THE principal items in the pianoforte recital given by Mlle. Eibenschütz at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon were Schubert's lengthy and perhaps slightly over-elaborated Sonata in D, Op. 53, the whole of Brahms's recently published pieces, Op. 118 and 119, and Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques.' The young pianist's efforts were occasionally wanting in tenderness, but they were characterized by much vigour and admirable mechanism.

A VERY popular scheme was offered at the Westminster Orchestral Society's concert on Wednesday evening, and there was an overflowing audience. Sir Charles Halle played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Lady Halle Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and the two artists joined in Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata. Miss Liza Lehmann introduced a scene from a work entitled 'Ballet d'Aufrefoix,' by Benjamin Godard, Op. 144; and the concert ended with Gade's melodious Symphony in A flat, No. 4.

YET another concert on Wednesday evening was that given by the Royal College of Music at the Imperial Institute. The programme was orchestral, and included a 'Rhapsodie Écossaise' by Dr. Mackenzie; Beethoven's Symphony in F, No. 8; and Bizet's suite 'Joux d'Enfants,' Op. 22. The performance was conducted by Prof. Villiers Stanford, and the playing was generally excellent.

SIGNOR TOSTI has joined the staff of the Royal Academy of Music as a professor of singing.

ACCORDING to a letter in La Nación of Florence, Verdi has decided to close his career as a composer with 'Falstaff,' the success of which has afforded him much gratification. He will devote his remaining years to the organization and maintenance of his proposed home for impoverished and aged vocalists.

PERFORMANCES NEXT WEEK.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

COURT. — 'Fashionable Intelligence,' a Dialogue. By Percy Fendall.

TOOLE'S. — 'The Best Man,' a Farce in Three Acts. By Ralph K. Lumley.

VERY far from favourable are the conditions under which l'œuvre de rideau are now ordinarily produced in England. Their usual purpose is to bolster up a half-successful play, or a successful play upon the wane. Under these circumstances it is surprising that so much excellent work is done. Mr. Fendall's new dialogue at the Court is good enough to be signed by Mr. Theyre Smith. It is bright, cynical, effervescent. Its plot is simple as it can be, a mere variant of the maxim concerning amantium ira. The execution is, however, happy, and the dialogue has both wit and relevancy. A trifle of this kind is anything or nothing, according to treatment. In this case it is something. The banter is especially happy, and the logic of the woman who, while declaring that the chief claim of her suitor upon her is his truthfulness, envelopes him in an atmosphere of lies, is essentially and divinely feminine. Mr. Brookfield gave a quietly effective presentation of the hero, and Miss Venne as the heroine established what has been growing increasingly apparent, that we have in her an admirable comedian as well as a sparkling soubrette.

'The Best Man' is an unpretending, innocent, and amusing farce. It is not overburdened with invention, but has some effective situations and some humorous dialogue. It supplies Mr. Toole with a character of a nervous, apprehensive, and ill-used director of a railway, in which he shows the various aspects of his humour. His company generally is well suited, and Miss Eliza Johnstone, by an excellent piece of acting, caused a distinct sensation in a small part. Miss Beatrice Lamb revealed a new and enchanting gift of broad comedy, which is likely to be of highest service to the stage. Mr. Billington, Mr. Lowne, and Mr. Coventry were also seen to advantage.

CHARLES MATHEWS AS OTHELLO.

21, Paddington Green, W.

I BEG to send you herewith a copy of a letter of Charles Mathews, written to his friend Mr. St. Aubyn. Besides clearing up a somewhat doubtful point in the 'Life' by Mrs. Mathews, it is of considerable interest as the comedian's own account of how he came to play a tragic part—Othello.

The letter, accompanied by the curious hoaxing bill, was recently sold, with other interesting theatrical items, by public auction at Chertsey, where the St. Aubyn family resided:—

Kentish Town, June 14th, 1836.

DEAR ST. AUBYN.—I will explain to you briefly—why I acted Othello, and why I did not act any other Tragedy part in my life if necessary—but I do not wish it to be supposed I gave my sanction to the notice at the bottom of the New York play bill as to my success in Richard, &c. I performed Othello—and certainly with some credit—and a great deal of applause. It was for a wager entirely. I never had intended to act in that play—but I had contended that it was easier for a comedian to perform a tragic part—than an actor whose habits had always been tragic, to assume low comedy. I accidentally said during the dispute—that if my face could be hidden I thought I could act some tragic characters. At last I said Othello for instance—for there I should be disguised. A hundred Dollars was offered that I would not dare perform it in New York. Done and done to the amount 250—Price the manager betted 1,000—that I would—and I did. It was thought so extraordinary an event—that Price had about 6 or 8 bills struck off with the addition at the bottom of my having acted other Tragic Characters. This was intended as a hoax upon some of my friends in England—and one of these have [sic] accidentally got in your possession. These are the real facts. Very sincerely yours,

C. MATHEWS.

The note to the playbill, which Mr. Mathews describes as a "hoax upon some of his friends," is as follows:—

"In consequence of the acclamation and unbounded applause which have attended Mr. Mathews during the latter part of his present engagement, in which he has played Tragic Characters only, the Public is respectfully informed, that he will perform Richard the Third.....and will conclude his engagement by performing (by particular desire) the character of Othello for the third time."

R. THURGATE.

Dramatic Society.

THE "remainder" of Alexander Dyce's edition of Gifford's 'Ford,' 3 vols., was disposed last week in Messrs. Sotheby's rooms at the sale of the late Mr. James Toovey's stock. Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen, who acquired nearly all the small-paper copies, will reissue them next month with the addition of Henry Goodcole's rare tract 'The Wonderful Discoverie of Elizabeth Sawyer, a Witch,' 1621, on which the play of 'The Witch of Edmonton' was partly founded. Dyce searched in vain for a copy of this tract, and Mr. Halliwell-Phillips was also unsuccessful.

ful. Mr. A. H. Bullen will contribute a general preface to the volumes.

MR. HEINEMANN is going to publish Mr. Stuart Ogilvie's play 'Hypatia,' which was performed some time ago at the Haymarket, in book form, apart from the edition to be sold in the provincial theatres where it is to be played. Mr. Heinemann's edition is printed by the Chiswick Press, a new frontispiece has been drawn by Mr. J. D. Batten, and the essential difference between the book edition and the theatre edition will be that the stage directions will be printed in red ink, after the fashion of the rubrics, and Mr. Batten's drawing of Hypatia herself in the church scene will be used.

A STRIKING proof of the interest taken in Ibsen's poem 'Brand'—so different in matter and manner from his "social dramas"—is the almost simultaneous appearance in English of two independent translations in verse: that by Prof. Herford and that by Mr. F. Edmund Garrett, which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Both profess to adhere to the metres of the original, an effort being made by Mr. Garrett to reproduce even the song of Einar and Agnes in the first act in rhythm more faithful to the original than that of any version extant. There is to be a frontispiece to Mr. Garrett's book illustrative of the scenery amid which 'Brand' is placed, but very few notes, the translator taking the line that the so-called "difficulties" of the poem are the creation of commentators.

THE last weeks of 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' at the St. James's are at length announced, and the new play of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones by which it is to be succeeded will shortly be put in rehearsal.

MR. PINERO's pleasant comedietta of 'Hester's Mystery,' interpreted by Miss Florence Fordyce, Miss Carlyon, Mr. Westland, and Mr. Lowne, is the opening piece at Toole's.

AN adaptation by Mrs. William Greet of 'The Little Squire,' by Mrs. de la Pasture, is promised at a series of afternoon representations at the Lyric Theatre.

'ONCE UPON A TIME' is the title selected for the version of 'Der Talisman' promised at the Haymarket for the 28th inst. Mrs. Tree, in addition to actors previously named, will be included in the cast.

'A MODERN EVE,' a three-act play by Mr. Malcolm Salaman, in which Mr. and Mrs. Tree will appear, is promised for an afternoon representation at the Haymarket.

'KING KODAK' is announced as the title of the novelty in which, according to present arrangements, Mr. Terry and Miss Kate Vaughan are to reappear at Terry's Theatre. This announcement, definitely made, is not easily reconcilable with the maintenance by Mr. Weedon Grossmith of his possession of a house at which 'The New Boy' has "caught on," nor with the promised production at the same house, under Messrs. Abud and Harris, of a new comic opera, the date of production of which is stated to be April 14th.

THIS evening witnesses the last performance at Drury Lane of 'Robinson Crusoe,' and the production at the Adelphi of 'The Cotton King,' as Mr. Sutton Vane's new play is now called. Upon its withdrawal on Saturday next from the Lyceum, the pantomime of 'Cinderella' will be taken to America, and played at Abbey's Theatre, New York, on April 23rd.

"Mr. Brett's magnificent work."—Daily Telegraph. "We know no authority more thorough and up-to-date."—Daily Chronicle. "A masterpiece of its kind. Mr. Brett's work is as interesting as it is valuable."—Black and White, Times.

"Is noteworthy for the very elaborate series of illustrations with which it is enriched." "We have lately had a sort of revival of the Man in Armour. Mr. Brett's splendid volume, therefore, has fallen on welcoming days."—Daily News. "It is a book that all antiquaries and lovers of ancient armour will deem a great acquisition to the shelves of their libraries."—Life. "Some of the finest pictures in Mr. Brett's books are Italian arms and weapons of the tourney. Mr. Brett is an enthusiastic believer in the life of the Middle Ages. His collection seems to be very rich."—Observer. "Many of Mr. Brett's suits of armour came from such well-known collections as those of Sir Samuel Rush Meyrick, Sir George Lindsay, Lord Londesborough, Count Gayneck, &c. Mr. Brett's work is a truly monumental volume."—Sporting and Dramatic News. "Every great library will have it upon their shelves. A truly magnificent work."—Kingsland.

Or, Christianity not as a Mystical Doctrine, but as a New Life-Conception.

With a Preface for this Edition by COUNT LEO TOLSTOI.

Translated from the Original Russian MS. by A. DELANO.

"There has grown up in our midst a new movement, which can only be called a Russian premonition of Christianity. ... Of this movement the greatest mass of genius now living is the inspiring and guide." Daily Chronicle.

"Whatever may be thought either of the philosophical value or of the practical feelings of its arguments, the frankness and sincere purpose of the book make it a work of literary and professional importance of the highest on the Continent." Scotsman.

THE THEATRICAL "WORLD" for 1898. By WILLIAM ARCHER.

"That the literary drama dealing with social problems made great advances during 1897 is universally admitted, but if proof were wanted, nothing could be more convincing than Mr. Archer's series of thoughtful and pointed articles." Daily Chronicle.
"As a record of the year's doings in the theatre, Mr. Archer's volume stands unrivalled." Daily News.

MODERN PAINTING. By George MOORE.

SOME PRESS NOTICES.

"Of the very few books on art that painters and critics should not so arrogantly leave unread, this is surely one." Standard.
"This book is one of the best books about pictures that have come into our hands for some years." The Londoner's Gentle.
"A more original, a better informed, a more suggestive, and, let us add, a more amusing work on the art of to-day, we have never read than this volume." Glasgow Herald.

NEW NOVEL BY GEORGE MOORE.

ESTHER WATERS: a Novel. By GEORGE MOORE.

PEER GYNT: a Dramatic Poem.

By HENRIK IBSEN. Translated by WILLIAM and CHARLES ARCHER. Authorized Version. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"To English readers this will not merely be a new work of the Norwegian poet, dramatist, and satirist, but it will also be a new theme. ...
I have in the imaginative there, indeed the theme of such a boldness, irresistible facility of fancy that one breathes with difficulty as one follows him on his headlong career. ... Peer Gynt is a fantastical satirical drama of enormous interest, and the present translation of it is a masterpiece of beauty, power, grace, and literary rendering." Daily Chronicle.

HISTORY of INDIA. From the Earliest Times to the Present Day. For the Use of Students and Colleges. By H. G. KENN, C.I.E., Author of 'The Fall of the Mughal Empire,' &c.

"Mr. Kenn's careful study deserves cordial praise. It is not easy to select from the twenty-four chapters into which the work is divided those which are most distinctly meritorious. In the first volume the sections which treat of the Mughal Empire are exceedingly interesting and instructive, and the short summary of pre-British History in India is admirable."—Leeds Mercury.

Christian World—"Nobody who begins the story will slip a single word."

A CATHEDRAL COURTSHIP.

Fourth Edition. 2s. 6d.

Punch—"There is only one word that will fittingly describe 'A Cathedral Courtship.' It is delightful."

Readers—"The book is in every way delightful."

Standard—"Any one who wants pure enjoyment, at once refined and healthy, can hardly do better than turn to 'A Cathedral Courtship.'"

Review of Reviews—"Mrs. Wiggin's new book will preserve the character of praise with which it has been received... The humor of it all is delightfully refreshing."

POLLY OLIVER'S PROBLEM.

Second Edition. 3s.

Daily Telegraph—"In none of Mrs. Wiggin's felicitous stories is the charm of unadorned freshness and spontaneous geniality more prevailingly potent than in her last charming sketch, 'Polly Oliver's Problem.'"

Standard—"It is a delightful story."

Glasgow Herald—"This is an extremely well written and thoroughly interesting story for girls."

British Leader—"No page will be shipped; surely Louise Alcott has at last found a successor."

Christian World—"It is surely a story for every body."

JOHN FRANCIS AND THE 'ATHENÆUM.' A LITERARY CHRONICLE OF HALF A CENTURY.

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"It is in characters so sterling and admirable as this that the real strength of a nation lies. The public will find in the book reading which, if light and easy, is also full of interest and suggestion. We suspect that writers for the daily and weekly papers will find out that it is convenient to keep these volumes of handy size, and each having its own index, extending the one to 20 the other to 30 pages, at their elbow for reference."

Liverpool Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis. As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"A mine of information on subjects connected with literature for the last fifty years."—Echo.

"No other fifty years of English literature contain so much to interest an English reader."—Freeman.

"A fascinating page of literary history."

Illustrated London News.

"Our survey has been unavoidably confined almost exclusively to the first volume; indeed, anything like an adequate account of the book is impossible, for it may be described as a history in notes of the literature of the period with which it deals. We confess that we have been able to find very few pages altogether barren of interest, and by far the larger portion of the book will be found irresistibly attractive by all who care anything for the history of literature in our own time."

Manchester Examiner.

"No memoir of Mr. Francis would be complete without a corresponding history of the journal with which his name will for ever be identified. The extraordinary variety of subjects and persons referred to, embracing as they do every event in literature, and referring to every person of distinction in science or letters, is a record of such magnitude that we can only indicate its outlines. To the literary historian the volumes will be of incalculable service."

Bookseller.

"This literary chronicle of half a century must at once, or in course of a short time, take a place as a permanent work of reference."

Publishers' Circular.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years. The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"Rich in literary and social interest, and afford a comprehensive survey of the intellectual progress of the nation."—Leeds Mercury.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."

Literary World.

SONGS for SAILORS.

Morning Post—"Spirited, melodious, and vigorously graphic."
Daily News—"Very spirited."
Full Mail Gazette—"Really admirable."
Evening Standard—"Full of a wide popularity."
John Bull—"Very successful."
Examiner—"Full of incident and strongly expressed sentiment and having a simple, dashing, musical roll and movements that remind us of some songs that are favourable with sailors and the tones of humour he introduces are precisely of the kind that they will relish."
Graphic—"We may fairly say that Dr. Bennett has taken up the mantle of Dorian."
Standard—"Dr. Bennett's heart is thoroughly in his work. All spirited and vigorous. There is a healthy, manly, fresh air about them which ought to make them popular with the class for whom we and pleasure they are designed."
Newspaper—"These songs bear a true literary mark, and give out the genuine ring."
Liverpool Mercury—"It is to be hoped these spirit-stirring songs may be sung in all parts of the world by our gallant tars, north and south, east and west—wherever, in short, the Union Jack flies proudly over the sea. We heartily commend Dr. Bennett's songs for sailors to the public at large."
Mirror—"With admirable felicity he embodies national sentiments and emotions which stir the hearts of the people."
Leeds Mercury—"There is no one nowadays who can compete with Dr. Bennett as a popular song writer. In his volume of old songs we find the qualities which most secure his success."
Liverpool Mail—"Dr. Bennett has devoted his lyrical powers to a noble object in this comprehensive yet instructive work. This great deserves to be patronized not only by our entire Royal Navy, but by all our Sailors' Homes and all our Mercantile Marine Associations."
Echo—"These songs are literally written for sailors, and they are precisely the kind of songs that sailors most enjoy."
Illustrated London News—"Exquisite with patriotic fire."
Songs of the World—"There is real poetry in these songs."

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST.

Messrs. METHUEN announce that in consequence of the large Subscription for the FOURTH EDITION of 'BARABBAS,' publication is postponed till March 15th, when a FIFTH EDITION will be ready.

Marie Corelli.—BARABBAS: a Dream of the World's Tragedy. By MARIE CORELLI, Author of 'A Romance of Two Worlds.' Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Miss Corelli's new romance has been received with much disapprobation by the secular papers, and with warm welcome by the religious papers. By the former she has been accused of blasphemy and bad taste; "a gory nightmare"; "a hideous travesty"; "grotesque vulgarization"; "unworthy of criticism"; "vulgar redundancy"; "sickening details"—these are some of the secular powers of speech. On the other hand, the Guardian praises "the dignity of its conceptions, the reserve round the Central Figure, the fine imagery of the scene and circumstance, so much that is elevating and devout"; the Illustrated Church News styles the book "reverent and artistic, broad based on the rock of our common nature, and appealing to what is best in it"; the Christian World says it is written "by one who has more than conventional reverence, who has tried to tell the story that it may be read again with open and attentive eyes"; the Church of England Pulpit welcomes "a book which teems with faith without any appearance of irreverence."

THIRTEENTH EDITION OF 'DODO.'

E. F. Benson.—DODO: a Detail of the Day. By E. F. BENSON. Thirteenth Edition. In 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

Few novels of late years have been so successful as 'Dodo.' In its two-volume form it has passed through ten editions, and has attracted by its brilliancy universal attention. The best critics have been cordial in their praise. The Guardian speaks of 'Dodo' as "unusually clever and interesting"; the Spectator called it "a delightfully witty sketch of society"; the Speaker said the dialogue was "a perpetual feast of epigram and paradox"; the Athenæum spoke of the author as "a writer of quite exceptional ability"; the Academy praised his "amazing cleverness"; the World said the book was "brilliantly written"; and half a dozen papers have declared that there was "not a dull page in the two volumes."

Gilchrist.—The STONE DRAGON. By MURRAY GILCHRIST. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A volume of stories weird and original.

"The author's faults are atoned for by certain positive and admirable merits. The romances have not their counterpart in modern literature, and to read them is a unique experience."—National Observer.

F. S. Carew.—JIM B. By F. S. CAREW. Crown 8vo. linen boards, 2s. 6d.

An unconventional and pathetic tale.

Mr. Gladstone.—THE SPEECHES and PUBLIC ADDRESSES of the Right Hon. W. M. GLADSTONE, M.P. With Notes. Edited by A. W. HUTTON, M.A. (Librarian of the Gladstone Library), and H. J. COHEN, M.A. With Portrait. 8vo. Vol. IX. 12s. 6d.

Messrs. METHUEN are issuing, in ten volumes, an Authorized Collection of Mr. Gladstone's Speeches, the work being undertaken with his sanction and under his superintendence. Notes and Introductions will be added.

In view of the political situation it is proposed to issue Vols. IX. and X., which will include the Speeches of the last seven or eight years, immediately, and then to proceed with the earlier volumes. Volume X. is already published.

O'Grady.—The STORY of IRELAND. By STANDISH O'GRADY, Author of 'Finn and his Companions.' Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"Novel and very fascinating history. Wonderfully alluring."—Corak Examiner.

"Most delightful, most stimulating. Its racy humour, its original imaginings, its perfectly unique history, make it one of the freshest, breeziest volumes."—Methodist Times.

"A survey at once graphic, acute, and quietly written."—Times.

WOMEN OF LETTERS.

(Memoirs of Lady MORGAN, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT SHELLEY, Lady ANNE BARNARD, MARY, COUNTESS COWPER, Mrs. OPIE, Lady DUFF GORDON, ELIZABETH INCHBALD, Miss MITFORD, "LAMB'S DUCHESS," Lady HERVEY, Lady MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU, Mrs. DELANY, Mrs. MONTAGU, and MARY and AGNES BERRY.)

By GERTRUDE TOWNSHEND MAYER.

2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

From the GLOBE.

"Two volumes which deserve to find many readers. It is impossible for many people to study biographical matter at first hand. The field is too wide; and the average reader is grateful to the writer who, surveying that field, brings away from it all that is essential, and presents it in a clear, concise, and picturesque fashion."

A SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

The PRIVATE LIFE OF NAPOLEON. From the French of ARTHUR LEVY by STEPHEN LOUIS SIMMON, Translator of 'The Youth of Frederick the Great,' &c. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 25s.

"The author has collected with rare skill and industry, from a vast literature of correspondence and memoirs.....He has produced a book of fascinating interest, and thrown vivid and various lights on the whole period of which he treats."—Mr. W. M. H. LUCKY on 'Napoleon Intimate' in the Pall Mall Gazette.

"The work is of exceptional interest, and sheds real light on the life and character of the first Emperor. It deserves a welcome in this country. We can commend the book as one that can be read with profit and enjoyment."—Scotsman.

"These valuable volumes are in every way well turned out; all we regret is the want of space to do them fuller justice. They will be in every historical library."—Speaker.

"Read Northcote the Painter's 'Conversations' by that clever coxcomb Hazlitt," says Mr. JOSEPH JERVIS in his amusing 'Letters,' just published.

CONVERSATIONS OF NORTHCOTE the PAINTER with HAZLITT. A New Edition. Edited by EDMUND GOSSE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

FREDERIC HILL: an Autobiography of Fifty Years in Times of Reform. Being the Recollections of a Retired Civil Servant. Edited by his Daughter, CONSTANCE HILL. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Portraits, 16s.

"A most entertaining book, teeming with anecdotes and reminiscences of notabilities, and also of incidents that carry us back to days which now seem far distant."—Manchester Examiner.

"A most entertaining volume. Much of Mr. Hill's recollections is delightfully fresh."—Athenæum.

"Unexpected but welcome light on the political and social movements of the century, together with much pleasant gossip of a personal kind, is to be found in these pages."—Leeds Mercury.

"A volume which in interest reads almost like a romance, and by those who take any interest in social reform it will be read with special profit and avidity. It has been admirably edited by Miss Hill."—London Courier.

"The pages teem with good stories, and pieces of history, local and national, political and literary, all told with charming simplicity and distinctness."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A busy and eventful life. The author knew most of the remarkable men of the century."—ibid.

"A charming book, most interesting and most readable."—Aberdeen Daily Free Press.

SECOND EDITION of The GREATER GLORY. By MAARTEN MAARTENS,

Author of 'The Sin of Joost Avelingh,' 'An Old Maid's Love,' and 'God's Fool.' 3 vols.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The appearance of a new novel by Maarten Maartens may fairly be called an event of importance in literature. The Dutch novelist has made his right to stand with our best authors.....No review can do justice to the many deep and delicate studies in this careful, brilliant, and picturesque book."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"A most ingenious and clever novel, full of good things.....Contains most admirable character-sketches."

OBSERVER.

MORNING POST.

"The novel is excellent from its breadth of view, its insight into human motive, and shows an increase rather than the reverse of the artistic skill which its author apart from other writers of romance perhaps quite as gifted as himself.....The work is also rich in epigram and humour, both incisive and original, and will rank among its author's best efforts."

SCOTSMAN.

"A serious and striking production."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Has high merits of pathos, of humour, of artistic colour, and pictorial suggestion."

WORLD.

"Has much that is charming in it, and bears the distinctive marks of the writer's genius."

SECOND EDITION of DIANA TEMPEST. By MARY CHOLMONDELEY, Author of

'Sir Charles Danvers' and 'The Danvers Jewels.' 3 vols.

The BARON DE BOOKWORMS in PUNCH says:—

"Those who love a really good novel, excellent both in story and in literary style, will be thankful to acquire, by purchase or loan, the goods—the extra good goods—which the Gods provide. There is neither page nor paragraph in these three volumes that can be skipped without loss to the skipper. Each character is carefully analyzed, in so incisive and epigrammatic a style, and with evidently so rare a knowledge of moral anatomy, as will occasionally remind the reader of Thackeray. The Baron wishes his friends no worse luck than a rainy afternoon for the perusal of 'Diana Tempest.'"

"Of Miss Cholmondeley's clever novels, 'Diana Tempest' is quite the cleverest."—Times.

A DEVOTED COUPLE.

By JOHN MASTERMAN,

Author of 'The Scots of Westminster.' 3 vols.

BRITOMART. By Mrs. Herbert

MARTIN. Author of 'Donnie Lesley,' &c. 3 vols.

"A novel full of strong scenes and strong characters."—Academy.

"A noble novel. The heroine of the touching, realistic, and deeply-thought-out story is a rarely beautiful and winning example of womanhood in its fairest and most worshipful aspects. The story is as charming as it is good."—World.

"A truly beautiful story. It is the purpose of this delightful book to demonstrate the power of a pure and valiant woman to make the world better. 'Britomart' will rank among the most noteworthy literary productions of the year."—Daily Telegraph.

"A thoroughly good novel."—Spectator.

THE ROMANCE OF SHERE MOTE. THE VICAR OF LANGTHWAITE.

By PERCY HULBURD.

3 vols.

From the DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Not only a story of singular ingenuity and power, but an album, so to speak, of brilliant character-sketches, graphic word-pictures, and trenchant epigrams. It is a book, in short, affording abundant proof that its author is entitled to rank in the first flights of contemporary novelists."

MOLLY and her MAN-O'-WAR. By

DR. ARABELLA KENNELLY, Author of 'Dr. Janet of Harley Street.' 1 vol. 6s.

"A narrative of the raciest, freshest humour merging into one of the sweetest of love stories."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

By LILY WATSON.

3 vols.

"This pretty story is a plea for tolerance and charity among the 'clashing of the creeds.' There is much that is touching in the book, much simple pathos, and bits of quaint humour.....A bright and pleasant novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SPEEDWELL. By Lady Guendolen

RAMSDEN. 1 vol. 6s.

"This graceful and pathetic book will please all readers. The story of woman's love and man's inconstancy is sweetly and freshly told."—Pall Mall Gazette.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"It is a book for the library of every statesman and publicist who is interested in Britain's relations with the East."
STANDARD.—"A singularly interesting work."
DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A valuable and faithful record of an eminent career and of an important chapter in the development of our Eastern possessions."
TIMES.—"These volumes will be eagerly studied by all who concern themselves seriously with the political and diplomatic history of the East."
GLASGOW HERALD.—"A memorial, to study which is an education in itself."

SOCIAL EVOLUTION. By Benjamin Kidd. 8vo. 10s. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"We venture to assert that in Mr. Kidd's work we have one of the most important and suggestive treatises on sociology which have been produced in England for many years. There is not a dull page in the book, and yet there is not one that is superficial."
SPECTATOR.—"We do not often devote a leader to a book, but we have an impression that Mr. Benjamin Kidd's book, 'Social Evolution,' may have wide political as well as social effects. At all events, it marks a turning-point in the social controversy which is raging all around us."
SPEAKER.—"Its brilliant and profound generalisations, and its original applications of new biological views, demand the attention of all students of society."
TIMES.—"It is not often that a new and unknown writer makes his first appearance with a work so novel in conception, so fertile in suggestion, and on the whole so powerful in exposition as 'Social Evolution' appears to us to be."
The work of a singularly penetrating and original mind."

LETTERS OF HARRIET COUNTESS GRANVILLE, 1810-1845.

Edited by her Son, the Hon. F. LEVESON GOWER.

"There are a number of pretty stories.....The writer shows herself on every page not only a most fond mother, but a most womanly woman, full of native shrewdness, and knowing more than she says. This will be one of the great books of the season."—Daily Chronicle.

"This most delightful and most discursive letter-writer,.....All kinds of figures appear: not only great people like George IV. and the Duke of Wellington, and the Duke de Broglie and Lord Brougham—to say nothing of Queen Victoria herself—but a wonderful variety of lesser lights, men and women who were for the nonce the social rage, or who had done something to amuse or shock, irritate or excite, inflame or depress, the circle in which they moved."—Daily Telegraph.

A FEW LITERARY OPINIONS.

"The work has been in general use throughout the department as a standard Dictionary for many years past."—Sir S. BLACKWOOD, K.C.B., Secretary to the Post Office.

"There are few books I know so well as Webster's Dictionary. I have used it for more than forty years, and I may say I have learnt English from it. It was recommended to me by Bunsen. I remember well when I asked him which he considered the best English Dictionary, he laughed, and said, 'The best English Dictionary is the American Dictionary by Webster.'"—Prof. MAX MÜLLER.

"What the Quarterly Review said of the last edition may, in my opinion, be said with fresh emphasis of the present edition—that it is the best practical English Dictionary extant."—Prof. E. DOWDEN.

"I have used the copy of 'Webster's International Dictionary' which you kindly sent me, and have found it exceedingly valuable. It would require a larger study than I have been able to give to say that it is free from defects or omissions; but I believe it to be the best English Dictionary."—The Rev. J. E. C. WELLDON, M.A., Head Master of Harrow School.

"Taken altogether, the 'International Dictionary' appears to me, considering its manifest value, almost as cheap as it is valuable. It should be possessed by every school library and by every English boy who, after leaving school, finds himself in the fortunate position of being able to buy."—The Rev. S. ABBOTT, late Head Master of the City of London School.

"I have been using for some time your new edition of 'Webster's English Dictionary.' It is a thoroughly good work, and I find it a very great improvement on the last edition."—Mons. F. E. A. GASC, compiler of 'A Dictionary of the French and English Languages.'

A FEW CRUSTED CHARACTERS.

By THOMAS HARDY.

Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

NOTE.—The First Large Edition
SOLD OUT a week before publication. The Second Large Edition nearly exhausted. A Third Large Edition in rapid preparation.

Early Press Opinions.

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"Life's Little Ironies" is the most interesting book of the week. There is no question about Mr. Hardy's popularity. The whole of the first edition in this case was sold before the book was sent to the newspapers or appeared in the booksellers' shops. The volume before me is marked 'second edition,' despite the fact that it was only published the other day." — Daily Telegraph

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"Does any single volume of Mr. Hardy's do his writer so much justice as this new batch of short stories and tales? We doubt it; and we confess to rising from its perusal with a more vivid impression of the variety of his gifts, the fertility of his resources, and the strength of his art, than we have ever had before." — St. James's Gazette

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"A new book by the author of 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles' is an event in the literary season. Mr. Hardy unites in himself the two great requisites of the romance—a story to tell, and a style to tell it in." — Glasgow Herald

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"Nobody is better qualified than the author of 'Tess' to produce work of this sort, and 'Life's Little Ironies' will be read with delight by all who appreciate imaginative delicacy combined with rare literary skill." — Liverpool Mercury

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"Readers, if such there be, who have not yet acquired a taste for the work of Thomas Hardy, ought to make haste to acquaint themselves with 'Life's Little Ironies.' They could not meet him in a more 'on-coming' mood. They will find his style at its simplest, his humour at its freshest, and his philosophy at its humanest. There is an extraordinary lavishness of invention in the book." — Westminster Gazette

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"Mr. Thomas Hardy has given us another volume of short stories, some of which will rank as part of his best literary work." — Queen

LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

"The quality of this welcome batch of stories, there cannot be a doubt that as a whole they are well worthy of Mr. Hardy at his best. 'On the Western Circuit' remains one of the best short stories Mr. Hardy has written.
'The Fiddler of the Reels' is also an exceedingly powerful and fascinating story." — Star

"Junius" Revealed. By his Surviving Grandson H. R. Francis. (Longmans & Co.)

(First Notice.)

Those who are intimately acquainted with the problem which Mr. Francis professes to solve will be the least impressed by his book. In fact, they will doubt whether he thoroughly understands the points at issue. To them a title-page, however plausibly and emphatically worded, will not bring conviction, and they will be puzzled when they compare what Mr. Francis has written about George Woodfall, the elder son of the printer of the Public Advertiser, styled in this volume "the younger Woodfall," with what is extant in Woodfall's handwriting. Mr. Francis says that George Woodfall was in his eighty-fourth year when he showed Mr. Francis the facsimile of some writing which is alleged to have been written by Junius. The age given is wrong, as George Woodfall was seventy-eight when he died on December 22nd, 1844. At the sight of the paper he exclaimed, "Good God! why that is the feigned hand of Junius!" He appeared to Mr. Francis "so much agitated and excited by the disclosure" that the latter was "seriously alarmed for the effect on his health." Mr. Francis vouches, however, for George Woodfall being then in "full mental vigour."

A year before his death George Woodfall wrote some comments on Jacques's work on Junius, which was published in 1843, and was designed to ridicule the contention of the Franciscans, and to uphold the claims of Lord George Sackville's friends that he was the writer. Woodfall's manuscript is preserved in the British Museum. In it he states his opinion that the Junian manuscripts were not written in a feigned hand, and adds that "the handwriting of Junius, as described by Mr. Tomkins, a writing master of the first eminence in the City of London, is a clear, easy flowing, expeditious hand." In Tom Taylor's Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds this expert (whose portrait Sir Joshua painted) is styled "the famous Mr. Tomkins." G. Woodfall furthermore writes that the one thing wanting is not what any one thinks as to the authorship of the Letters, "but proof through facts that are unquestionable." This sensible demand has been put forth and upheld in these columns by Mr. Dilke, and it will be found thus expressed in his 'Papers of a Critic,' at p. 89 of the first volume:—

"When once we shall have got hold of a right conjecture as to who was the writer, every date, fact, and incident in his life must offer itself in proof, and we shall have more than enough of these to settle the question beyond all cavil."

Once the secret of Junius is "revealed," discussion will be superfluous. What Mr. Francis considers a revelation is a restatement of circumstances which are chiefly hypothetical, and of facts which, even if accepted as indisputable, leave the question of the authorship of Junius in the mist which surrounded it before he wrote. He maintains, however, that he has "absolute proof" of the Letters having been written by his grandfather, and he puts forth these two propositions:—

"First: The feigned hand of Junius must have been that of the author of the Letters.

"Secondly: That feigned hand was Francis's."

The controversy having resolved itself, as Mr. Leslie Stephen holds that it has done, into determining whether the handwriting of the Junian manuscripts is feigned or natural, we shall concisely deal with this matter before following Mr. Francis in his arguments, and estimating the value of his assertions.

These Letters began to appear in 1769, and they were collected and revised by their author, and published by Henry Sampson Woodfall in 1772. From the time they were penned till the year 1816 the hypothesis about a feigned handwriting had not been formulated. When, however, Mr. Taylor arrived at the conclusion that Francis was Junius—on grounds which were found to be wholly erroneous when the 'Memoirs' of Sir Philip Francis appeared in 1867—it was necessary for Taylor to assume that the handwriting was feigned, because of its differing from that of Francis. Taylor gave himself no trouble to prove his theory, calmly remarking, "From the beginning Junius wrote in a disguised hand." A feigned hand serves the same purpose as a mask. A man or woman whose face is masked may walk among friends and acquaintance without being recognized, while the page written in a feigned hand gives no clue to the writer. These are truisms, yet they require to be remembered when the partisans of Francis assert that the reason for his known handwriting differing from that of the Junian manuscripts is that the latter is feigned. But Junius, unlike Mr. Taylor and others, did not think that his writing was a disguise, and we submit that, on this head, his opinion is more weighty than theirs. He accompanied his short and stinging letter to Garrick with a note, telling Woodfall:—

"I would send the above to Garrick directly, but that I would avoid having this hand too commonly seen. Oblige me, then, so much as to have it copied in any hand, and sent by the penny post, that is if you dislike sending it in your own writing. I must be more cautious than ever."

Why this craven fear if the handwriting were feigned? Junius often corresponded with Wilkes through the intermediary of Woodfall. On the 21st of September, 1771, he sent a paper which he wished Wilkes to lay before the "Society of the Bill of Rights," and said that "it should be copied over in a better hand," adding in a postscript, "By all means let it be copied. This manuscript is for private use only." Wilkes assured him, in reply, that it had been "transcribed." Again we ask, why should Junius make these conditions if his handwriting were feigned, and not (as Woodfall, and Tomkins, a contemporary and an expert, declared) a natural hand? We reproduce, in strong and distinct confirmation of this, what a distinguished French expert has said, his statement in full having appeared in the Athenæum for the 30th of April, 1892. M. Étienne Charavay was requested by Mr. Alfred Morrison to examine the Junian manuscripts in the British Museum, and in reply to Mr. Morrison's question whether the handwriting was feigned he said, "Certainly not," and he made the like reply to the further one, whether the writing of Francis was like that of Junius.

If Mr. Francis had known these things (and his ignorance must be assumed if his statements are to be excused), then he would not have written as he has done about the feigned hand of Junius being the feigned hand of Francis. He considers, however, that he has put forward new evidence which conclusively proves his contention that Junius was his grandfather. He says:—

"The following facts are certain. In the year 1771 my grandfather [this is his true grandfather, Philip Francis] was at Bath with his American friend and kinsman, Tilghman. During their visit, Miss Giles, a young lady remarkably gifted both in mind and person, received a copy of complimentary verses, written in a bold hand closely resembling Francis's, but enclosed in an envelope professing giving the sender's reason for forwarding the lines to Miss Giles as the person for whom they must have been intended."

The words in the envelope are said to have been written by Francis in the feigned hand of Junius. Hence the conclusion: Junius and Francis are one. That Francis composed the verses may be readily admitted. Mr. Twissleton, who considered the prose and the verses to be evidence in favour of the Franciscan theory, candidly and truthfully affirms that there is not a shadow of proof of Francis having forwarded either or both to Miss Giles. Tilghman copied the verses; it is reasonable that he may have written in a somewhat different hand the note which accompanied them, and it is probable that he sent them.

There are four versions of the story of the verses, and each differs in certain particulars; we shall quote from those by Mr. Greville and the Dean of Bristol, the latter appearing in Parkes and Merivale's 'Memoirs' of Sir Philip Francis, throughout which Francis is treated as another, yet the same as Junius. Greville records:—

"Giles told me about the letter to his sister written by Francis, and which was supposed to have afforded another proof that he was Junius. Many years ago Francis was in love with his sister, Mrs. King (at Bath), and one day she received an anonymous letter, enclosing a copy of verses. The letter said that the writer had found the verses, and being sure they were meant for her, had sent them to her. The verses were in Francis's handwriting, the envelope in a feigned hand. When the discussion arose about Francis being Junius, Giles said to his sister one day, 'If you have kept those verses which Francis wrote to you many years ago at Bath, it would be curious to examine the handwriting and see if it corresponds with that of Junius.' She found the envelope and verses, and, on comparing them, the writing of the envelope was identical with that of Junius as published in Woodfall's book."

The second version runs:—

"About the time that 'Junius Identified' was published, a party was assembled at Youngsbury in Essex, which included the Kings, man and wife; Mrs. King had been a Miss Giles. The book had been sent down to Youngsbury, and was the subject of conversation. Mrs. King heard some of the party speaking of the facsimiles of Junius's handwriting, inserted in the book. Having looked at them, she said, 'I know that handwriting well.' 'Whose then is it?' asked some one. 'Philip Francis's.' 'How do you know?' 'When I was young, and first going into society at Bath, I received letters and poetry from an anonymous admirer written in a feigned hand; these were afterwards traced to Sir Philip Francis.' 'Have you preserved those papers?' 'Yes, and not only preserved them, but I have got them here.' 'Well, then, get them, and let us look at them.' Having been looked at, the whole party assented that the hands were identical. This was told me by the Duke of Bedford."

It is now known, as we have said, that the verses are in Tilghman's handwriting. The party at Youngsbury agreed, however, that the handwriting of the lines and the prose was identical. While mistaken on this point, there may be some truth in the further conclusion that the same hand had penned both. We note in passing how strange it is to read about the letters and verses being traced to an anonymous admirer who wrote in a feigned hand! Such a person not only wore a mask, but had his whole person shrouded as completely as the Familiars of the Inquisition. To have penetrated this double disguise is a feat which we should not have deemed possible.

We are better acquainted with the doings of Francis at Bath in 1771 than Miss Giles was, and it is certain that she was under a delusion concerning him. Mr. Twissleton, who expended much money to little profit in investigating the Junian handwriting, enlarges on the Bath episode, deeming it most important in the discussion. He intimated that Francis and Miss Giles had often been partners in the dance. If Francis were then a dancing man, he was not Junius, seeing that, two months before the Bath episode, Wilkes had offered Junius tickets for a ball at the Mansion House, and he had received this reply:—

"Many thanks for your obliging offer; but, alas! my age and figure would do but little credit to my partner. I acknowledge the relation between Cato and Portia, but in truth I see no connexion between Junius and a minuet."

Other verses said to be from Junius have been discovered, or revealed, in addition to those regarding which Miss Giles declared, in her old married age, that they came to her in a feigned hand from an anonymous admirer whom she knew to be Francis. In the Morning Herald for the 15th of January, 1813, a letter signed J. contained the two following sentences:—

"It is said that the author of the celebrated Letters under this signature [Junius] has been positively ascertained; and that they were written by the Marquess of Lansdowne, father of the present nobleman who bears that title. The secret, it appears, was not discovered by its connexion with any political affairs; but by some verses in the possession of a lady, who had a copy of them before they were transmitted to the printer for publication, and the handwriting of the Marquess is ascertained without the possibility of a doubt."

This statement is as precise as any in Mr. Francis's book. But, in the absence of actual proof as to the personality of Junius, a statement in the affirmative is but a guess which cannot carry conviction to any intelligent reader, and a denial follows almost as a matter of course. Three days after J. had made the foregoing declaration, A. P. R. wrote from Lincoln's Inn to the Morning Herald, and said "that his lordship's style, either of public speaking or of writing, bore no resemblance to that of Junius, and their handwritings were equally dissimilar."

The love-making between his grandfather and Miss Giles at Bath in 1771, which Mr. Francis takes for granted, is more than problematical. Philip Francis was then a married man who had five children, who expected a sixth to appear at any moment, and who was greatly concerned as to how he could support them. His visit to Bath was chiefly owing to his desire to nurse his father, who was seriously ill. He wrote frequently to his wife. In his first letter he says:—

"There is nothing in this place to give me the smallest pleasure. My father may hold out for years in this deplorable condition, or he may die to-morrow. In short, I am a little heart-sick."

Again:—

"My father was well enough this morning to go abroad in a chaise. He is hardly sensible of my being here, and if I did not live cheap, and did not expect Mr. Godfrey, I would return many days sooner than I intended. I have dined but once at a tavern, and have never supped out. I am very uneasy about the dear children, and much more so about you."

The man who wrote in this strain to his wife is held by his grandson to have been at the same time making ardent love to Miss Giles, and for this reason, among others equally cogent, to have been Junius! If, instead of writing to little purpose about the verses to Miss Giles as Belinda, Mr. Francis had discovered and given an account of the 'Poems by Junius' which appear among the new books in the Gentleman's Magazine for May, 1772, he might have supplied the public with some things which were both new and curious.

It is notorious that when Francis was in Bengal he became too intimate with Madame Grand, and that her husband obtained from him 5,000*l.* damages. But in 1771 Francis was devoted to his own wife. His conjugal virtues excited the wonder of his American cousin Tilghman, who wrote to his father at Philadelphia towards the end of 1770, and said that he knew Francis "as thoroughly as any man on earth," and knew him to possess many merits, "among which are strong domestic attachments, such as a libertine is incapable of." Tilghman enjoyed life when he was in England, and he found the gay existence at Bath entirely to his taste. The truth appears to be that it was not the married man overburdened with family cares and grieving for the shattered health of his father, but the lively young bachelor Richard Tilghman, who flirted with Miss Giles and flattered her with verses which his cousin had written for him.

The marriage which Francis contracted in 1762 was imprudent, and much of his time was occupied in devising how to better his condition, his pay as a clerk in the War Office not sufficing for his domestic needs. He was not the man to reject any handsome offer from the Government. Yet those who hold he was Junius believe that, as such, he would have written, as Junius did in 1769, that he had not been bought off by the ministry, and would have added:—

"It is true I have refused offers, which a more prudent or a more interested man would have accepted.....and you, I think, sir, may be satisfied that my rank and fortune place me above a common bribe."

Mr. Francis plumes himself upon giving to the world a circumstance which he deems of great moment in connexion with the verses which Miss Giles received and treasured. He regards them and their envelope as "the conclusive external evidence which would have finally identified Junius." He says that in conversation, "about 1852," with Lady Francis, the second wife of his grandfather, "there was neither agreement nor confidence between us as to the light in which the authorship of 'Junius' should be viewed." However, in answer to the inquiry whether she had any verses by her husband, she produced a copy of those received by Miss Giles, which had been sent to her by the widowed Francis when he was her lover, in answer to her request that he would let her have some of his youthful poetry. This was an obvious opportunity for Francis to show how closely the natural hand of Junius could be imitated by him. He did not avail himself of the chance. It may be true, as is said by his grandson, that the writing of verses was not one of his talents. Yet Junius had produced lines which, if not poetical, were certainly pointed. They appeared in 1768, before he had written anything under the signature which he has made famous, and the handwriting of the original is in what is rightly termed the Junian hand, the title being 'Harry and Nan'—not, as Mr. Francis writes, 'Nancy and Harry.' A copy is in the fourth volume of 'The New Foundling Hospital for Wit,' and the original is in the British Museum. If Francis had transcribed the verses to Belinda in a handwriting resembling that of the lines entitled 'Harry and Nan,' he would have supplied proof that he could employ the feigned hand which he is said to have been able to write with ease. Not a single line which has been actually penned by him corresponds with the writing of the Junian manuscripts.

The Psalter of the Great Bible of 1539: a Landmark in English Literature. Edited with Introduction and Notes by John Earle, M.A. (Murray.)

THE phrase in the title of this volume, "a Landmark in English Literature," must, we think, be pronounced somewhat misleading and delusive. It undoubtedly makes the reader expect a thorough treatment of the literary importance of the Psalter here reprinted; and it is not justified by the event. Prof. Earle has produced something of considerable interest and value, but of a general rather than a special kind. His work is more for the public at large than for scholars in particular. It is worthy of a place in every clergyman's library—if clergymen in these hard times can spare anything for new books—and on the shelves of all who care for a brief abstract of information on the subject of psalmody. It is by turns instructive, critical, "edifying." To listen to the discoursing of an accomplished man of letters such as Dr. Earle is always a pleasure in its way; and we feel sure there will be, or should be, very many who will peruse these present pages with both pleasure and profit. But it cannot be said they make any noticeable addition to English scholarship, though they will serve to remind us how much has yet to be done by English scholars even in connexion with Coverdale's Psalter.

Of the sixty-eight pages of the introduction, only some dozen are devoted strictly to the English Psalter. Rather more space is given to a highly readable sketch of the Psalter in Greek and Latin, and to what Prof. Earle calls the "prophetic" as distinguished from the "scientific" interpretation of the Psalms. About twice as much is taken up by an account of the Hebrew Psalter, and of the revival of Hebrew study, or rather of its first pursuit, by the Church reformers of the sixteenth century. Rouchlin, who "composed the first Hebrew grammar and lexicon for the use of Christians," was himself taught by Obadiah Sforzo, the Jewish commentator; and Melancthon was taught by Rouchlin. "A Protestant study from the first, it was in a special manner appropriated by the German Protestants." And, in the spirit of a scholar who is not afraid that sound scholarship can in any important sense quarrel with sound theology, Dr. Earle sketches the progress of Hebrew study, and gives the new criticism a confident though not a blind welcome. "To follow De Wette," he says, "through the shifts by which he evades the admission of Maccabean psalms, e.g. lxxiv., lxxix., lxxxiii., is a schooling in the opposite opinion." The professor gives a most useful "tabular conspectus" of the various views of eminent scholars as to the chronology of the Psalms, a glance at which "will quickly convey what it would take many pages to describe." And on the whole, though he is most careful to express himself not dogmatically, but as an inquirer, and one who feels that the last word on this subject is far indeed from having yet been spoken, his inclination is obviously towards accepting much later dates than used to be commonly and so positively asserted. Thus he writes:—

"A conviction is growing that the bulk of the Psalter was produced in the Exile or after it, and the truth of this opinion is confirmed by a variety of considerations, among others this—that it gives the Psalms a chronological place in the Canon which harmonizes with the formula in the New Testament 'The Law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms' (Luke xxiv. 44). There is no reason why we should discard the old tradition which traces Hebrew psalmody up to David; at the same time the nearer approach of the Psalter (as a whole) to the New Testament will perhaps soon be accepted as a gain by many who have been reluctant to accept the change of view. Perhaps they will find that a sense of their own nearness to the Psalter, which though they had not formulated they had often implicitly felt, is now explained and justified."

After this section on the Hebrew Psalter comes that on the English Psalter, of which only the second subsection deals with "the import of our Psalter in English literature," which is ostensibly the main theme—the raison d'être—of the introduction. The first subsection discusses "the relation of our Psalter to the Greek (Latin) and Hebrew"; and the third deals with "the function of the English Psalter in the Church," giving some cursory account of modern psalmody down to the present day. Prof. Earle ingeniously remarks that "the Congregationalists have the honour of being the founders of modern English hymnody."

"It was only natural that those who were without a traditional Liturgy should be the first to discover the need of hymns in united worship. The pressure of this want produced many hymn-writers in the course of the seventeenth century, but to none was it given to understand its nature and find the way to satisfy it until Dr. Watts began to publish hymns in 1707..... He struck the true note of spiritual communion in united worship, and he found what was fitting for congregational use..... About 1738 came the first great burst of sacred song in the Church of England. It was connected with the religious revival which was begun in Oxford by two brothers, John Wesley, a Fellow of Lincoln College, and Charles, an undergraduate of Christ Church."

The introduction is followed by a reprint of the 1539 Psalter "in proximate facsimile such as was practicable with types ready to hand, every form of word being kept, and also the content of every line." And at the end of this reprint a hundred pages of notes, textual, explanatory, and of other kinds, complete the volume.

Thus, as has been remarked, Prof. Earle has produced something of considerable interest and value; but what his title-page distinctly suggests he scarcely carries out. Yet that suggestion would be well worth carrying out. It would be well worth carefully investigating to what extent Coverdale's Psalter has influenced both our language and our literature, as a part of the general question, which also, though acknowledged, has as yet received no adequate treatment, viz., to what degree and in what way or ways the various translations of the Bible, especially the Authorized Version, and also the Book of Common Prayer, have influenced our language and literature.

Certainly the influence of the newly unsealed Hebrew Scriptures on the Elizabethan age—on Shakespeare, for example—was larger and deeper than seems to have been recognized in any of the booklets that handle the subject. The author of 'The Merchant of Venice' had assuredly perused them with no slight attention. Dr. Earle states that it was Bishop Lowth who made the "discovery of the parallelism of Hebrew poetry, for the significance of which I refer the reader to Dr. Driver's 'Introduction,' p. 340 ff." But surely it had been perceived and felt by him who represents Shylock talking in this wise:

"I would my daughter were dead at my foot and the jewels in her ear! Would she were heard and at my foot and the ducats in her coffin!..... And no satisfaction, no revenge; nor no ill luck stirring but what lights on my shoulders; no sighs but of my breathing; no tears but of my shedding."

At all events, Dr. Earle should have furnished more details as to this Psalter of 1539. He should at least have stated that it first appeared in 1535 in Coverdale's Bible, and that it reappeared in 1537 in what is known as Matthew's Bible; and that the Great Bible, in which it appeared in 1539, was republished no fewer than six times. The differences, whatever they are, between these various issues—there are certainly some between the 1539 and the 1540 editions, as Dr. Earle does observe—should have had at least a passing reference. And it is disappointing that Dr. Earle is so extremely perfunctory both on the origin and on the character of Coverdale's English. He has, indeed, scarcely anything to say, or at least says scarcely anything, on these two important points. It is to be hoped he may presently supply the public with a real "study" of a work whose force and beauty and influence he evidently keenly appreciates—a study worthy of himself and worthy of the subject.

Memories of the Mutiny. By Francis Cornwallis Maude, V.C., C.B. With which is incorporated the Personal Narrative of John Walter Sherer, Esq., C.S.I. 2 vols. (Remington & Co.)

THE time has not yet come when a satisfactory history of the Mutiny can be written. The books we have are simply material, good or bad, for future use; the evidence is incomplete and, to some extent, unverified, but it is accumulating; and no doubt hereafter, when personal susceptibilities are less prominent, a writer will be found who may tell the story without suspicion of partiality in language worthy of so great a theme. That this is now impossible is manifest, amongst other things, from the extreme sensitiveness to criticism, often in itself unworthy of attention, displayed by actors in the various scenes and by their surviving friends or relatives. If public men in England were so constituted, they would not survive a week's issue of the opposition newspapers, and our lives would be made a burden by reason of their continual lamentation.

During the present year two books relating to the Mutiny have been reviewed in this journal: the first (Athen. No. 3456), consisting of selections from the records of the Government of India, edited by Mr. Forrest, is an instalment of a series likely to be useful, due weight being given to the fact that a great deal of information which is of value for history does not necessarily appear in official papers; the second (No. 3460), being reminiscences by Mr. Forbes-Mitchell, who was a sergeant in the 93rd, has the peculiar recommendation of being a description from the ranks. And now we have a third contribution to the literature of the Mutiny, a book which, though perhaps not widely noticed, may be said to have raised a storm wholly incommensurate with its real value in what we may without offence call the service teacup.

The work is a joint production by two gentlemen—one a distinguished and gallant Artillery officer, the other a highly respected and able member of the Indian Civil Service—and is, perhaps for this reason, singularly disjointed. For the military author possesses a vein of bitter criticism, and indulges his fancy to an extent which inclines his readers to imagine that he is a disappointed man whose strictures must not be taken too seriously; whilst the civilian, on the other hand, writes easily and pleasantly, with an evident desire to avoid offence. Their work, therefore, must be separately considered, and we take that of the soldier first. Col. Maude, as we have just stated, is an officer whose services during the Mutiny were highly meritorious and gained for him the V.C. and other decorations; an account, therefore, of his experiences could scarcely fail to prove valuable and interesting. He has not, however, confined himself to these, but has diverged from them considerably, without that respect for accuracy and good taste which might reasonably have been expected. His work, consisting of gossip rather than of sifted evidence, is discursive to an extraordinary degree, and much discretion will have to be exercised and examination made before his statements are admitted to be accurate. For example, a pursuit of the enemy by the volunteer cavalry led by Outram and Havelock is described in which neither of the generals drew his sword, and it is said:—

"The moment the charge was over Havelock rode straight up to my guns, his horse bleeding copiously from four or five tulwar cuts. As the poor beast commenced to stagger, the General quickly dismounted, saying to me, with a proud but melancholy intonation: 'That makes the sixth horse I have had killed under me!' and, sure enough, the animal died in a few minutes."

Now, this seems extremely circumstantial, yet we believe Col. Maude's memory has misled him. For the charge was led by Outram, accompanied by Lieut. Havelock, whose father the general was at the time two miles in rear with the main body of the force, and on that day had no horse killed nor wounded, neither could his voice, however intoned, have reached Col. Maude. Outram did not draw his sword, but used a Malacca cane, and thereby imperilled his life; young Havelock, however, rode between him and his assailant, whom he killed, but not before his charger had received a cut from which it soon died, close to Col. Maude's battery.

Many of Col. Maude's remarks about the generals are written in a kindly and appreciative spirit, and with some of his criticisms we cordially concur; but in other instances his reflections are so gratuitously invidious that we are disposed to account for them by some natural bluntness of perception and peculiarity of temperament rather than by reason of intentional malevolence. In this view we are confirmed by his recital without apparent repugnance that he unjustly charged a brother officer and former comrade with misappropriation of money, and lodged him in gaol: a mistake which cost 250*l.*, and a story which tells solely against Col. Maude himself. So when it is implied that Havelock was guilty of partiality in recommending his son for the V.C., we hope that the author does not realize that such suggestions are as invidious as they are unne-sary. Both Col. Maude and the younger Havelock were gallant officers, and more than once earned the coveted distinction; but as each of them got it the world is unlikely to concern itself further and to desire the exhumation of old camp gossip and scandal which had better be forgotten.

Again, in writing of Sir Colin Campbell, all reasonable bounds of propriety are exceeded when the alternative is suggested that the gallant old soldier either "wished to spin out the campaign for private reasons of his own," or was afraid to meet the enemy, for that is by implication conveyed in what purports to be a quotation from one of Lord Dalhousie's despatches: "Colonel Colin Campbell has carried caution to the confines of cowardice." It would be interesting to know whether the quotation can be verified; we confess to considerable doubt. Sir Colin was a soldier educated in the Peninsular war, and accustomed to the discipline and tactics necessary when opposed to a European enemy; he may, therefore, not improbably have shown a disinclination to move until his strength and arrangements were in his opinion complete, when officers accustomed to Indian enemies only might perhaps have advanced with success. Moreover, he looked solely to his commander-in-chief, and not to officers in civil employment, for orders respecting military matters, and this caused the friction with Lord Dalhousie, who believed he had detected a desire to thwart his authority as Governor-General under the cloak of military discipline. He therefore censured Campbell for having manifested "over-cautious reluctance" in moving out against the marauders from Swat, and for his attitude towards the authority of the Governor-General in Council. Sir Colin forthwith resigned, and in due course Dalhousie himself publicly acknowledged the brigadier's ability, intrepidity, and activity. It may be open to question whether the Governor-General of India was well advised in employing the terms of reproof he did to such an officer, but there can be no doubt that Col. Maude is not justified by the rules of good taste or by the laws of necessity in repeating them, even if unexaggerated.

We have little space left to notice Mr. Sherer's share of the work, in which his escape from Futtehpore (Hussowa), his adventures with Havelock's column, and his stay at Cawnpore as magistrate are well described, and form the most attractive part of the book. His remarks on the subject of Outram, who when entrusted with the command of the troops made over his task to Havelock, commend themselves to our judgment. The chivalry of Outram's action in waiving his position, in order that another who had borne the burden and heat of the day might reap the reward, appeals with certainty of success to the feelings and imagination. Yet duty is one thing, generosity another, and the simple question is, When an officer is entrusted with a command, has he the right whilst fit for service to devolve his responsibility on a junior? A somewhat similar state of divided authority occurred when Sir Henry Hardinge, Governor-General of India, and therefore in the highest position there, voluntarily assumed the place of second in command to Sir Hugh Gough in the first Sikh war; and in that case the Government of England, whilst recognizing the patriotic motives which influenced Hardinge, decided as a question of principle that it might be productive of serious inconvenience, if not injury to the public service, if the head of the Government should serve in a subordinate capacity.

Many of the illustrations have, we think, been published before, "The Interior of the Billiard Room in the Residency" being especially familiar; "Prizo Agents searching for Concealed Treasure" is particularly good, and tells its tale with great completeness. The type, paper, and binding are alike excellent.

History of the English Landed Interest.—Modern Period. By R. M. Garnier. (Sonnenchein & Co.)

As might be expected, the work of Mr. Garnier improves as he approaches our own time. We have the same happy combination of historical and practical knowledge of the subject without the drawback of having to deal, as in the former volume, with matters on which scholars themselves are not yet agreed. The author, moreover, is felix opportunitate sua. Between agricultural depression on the one hand and predatory politics on the other, the landed interest is passing through the greatest crisis of its fortunes, and its fate has become a burning question. In these pages the reader is told how it came to be what it is, and, looking back, he may cease to wonder that the ruin of the greatest industry and the most powerful interest in the kingdom should have seemed, till very recent days, an impossibility.

Broadly dividing the period of which he here treats into the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries, the author devotes special attention to tracing, in the former, the growth of taxation on the land, and analyzing the principles on which it was based. With extreme care and fairness he discusses the origin of the land tax, tracing its evolution out of the "subsidy" and "property tax" of earlier times, and claiming that here also, as with the tithe and the poor rate, personality has succeeded in evading its original liability, while the introduction of an income tax (1799) meant that land was made to pay twice over. But, apart from the question of abstract justice, he traces to the legacy duty of 1796, extended to landed succession in 1853, "the first blow at thrift," and an important element in the present agricultural depression.

Mr. Garnier's remarks on the long struggle between the rival interests of corn and wool deserve careful attention. He shows us how, in spite of adverse legislation, sheep-farming had thriven and extended, till the lavish encouragement by the State of corn husbandry turned the scale and led to drastic alterations in our treatment of the land. The chief element in bringing about this change was the system of bounties on exported corn, initiated even before the Revolution of 1688. But it was not till after the middle of the last century that the full force of the movement was felt. The prosperity of agriculture, so far as we can see, even though artificially fostered, led to a rapid improvement in its methods, together with a vast extension of the corn-growing area, which high prices and an improved system combined to render possible. Mr. Garnier is not, indeed, the first to dwell on the enormous importance of the introduction of green crops and mixed farming, but he has the merit of showing its connexion with enclosures, which formed so prominent an economical feature under George III. It illustrates his fairness that, while setting forth the advantages, and indeed the necessity, of enclosures, he dwells on their drawbacks for the labouring classes, whom nothing could compensate for the loss of their common rights. He also brings out clearly the evil effects of "tillage by compulsion," in the place of simple reclamation of waste.

In his chapters on the "husbandry" and the "farm live stock" of the period, Mr. Garnier exhibits at its strongest that practical knowledge of his subject which imparts to his book its peculiar value. Perhaps, in saying that marling was resuscitated in the last century, having been practised "in early Tudor times," he has not gone far enough; for the Domesday of St. Paul's (1222) speaks of the improved value of the Chapter's estate at Beauchamp "in terris marlatis," and the Abingdon Cartulary describes the reclamation of land at Colne (also in Essex), "compositiones terre quæ vulgo 'Marla' dicitur." So, too, with the famous South Downs, of which we read that the flock was so hardy that "during the winter" it "was never taken off the downs where its fold was situated." We believe that even now the practice of sending sheep to be kept in the Weald districts from Michaelmas to Ladytide is not wholly abandoned.

Concurrently with the improvements in agriculture, helped on, as the author shows, by the zealous "amateurs" of the time, there was much mismanagement of landed property through a bad system of leasing. The "engrossing" of farms, that is, the throwing together of small holdings—which went on steadily till quite lately, and has proved the cause, we fear, of much discontent, by widening the gulf between the labourer and the farmer—was in operation a century ago; the cost of living had increased more rapidly than the wages of labour; and the poverty which, as we are often reminded, accompanied the prosperity of the landed interest, was the result.

With the nineteenth century the author deals more briefly. One can see that the dominant feature, to his mind, of the period is the tension between the landed and the commercial classes, and the jealousy which led the latter to assail the interests of the former in the name of labour. Thus the repeal of the corn laws affords him a fitting close, the counter movement having now set in with the strife between the capitalist and the workman. Himself a free trader, Mr. Garnier steadily upholds the principle that it is unjust to lay as heavy (indeed heavier) burdens on the landed interest now as when it enjoyed the advantages of protection. His remarks on the difficult question of the poor laws and on the experiments of the Legislature on them are peculiarly valuable at the present time, and, like the rest of the book, are full of instruction for politicians.

It must not be supposed that the book is a "heavy" one. Such a chapter as that on "The New State of England" shows that Mr. Garnier can write picturesquely and well, and is able to impart his knowledge in a pleasant and readable form. He has produced an exceedingly useful, and in some ways a remarkable work.

The Adventure Series.—The Memoirs and Travels of Mauritius Augustus, Count de Benyowski. In Siberia, Kamchatka, Japan, the Liukiu Islands, and Formosa. From the Translation of his Original Manuscript (1741–1771) by William Nicholson, F.R.S., 1790. Edited by Capt. Pasfield Oliver. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin.)

It is probably since the world became, or professed to be, respectable that the word adventurer has had a dubious significance, and it is certainly in the unfavourable sense that Capt. Oliver would apply it to the subject of this book. But the career of Benyowski has never quite ceased to be a popular theme, whether for biography, or drama, or fiction; and even making all the deductions which Capt. Oliver would make from his credibility, enough remains to give him a very fair claim to the title of adventurer. For it is, at all events, undisputed that, having as an extremely young man seen some service in the wars against the Polish Protestants supported by Russia, he was taken prisoner by the Russians and carried off to Siberia and Kamchatka as an exile; that while there he organized, or joined in, a revolt in which the local governor was killed, and then, seizing a ship, he arrived after a four months' voyage at Macao, whence he obtained a passage, along with his followers, to the Mauritius, and thence to France. And here the volume before us terminates, though any narrative of the adventurer's life is incomplete without his later experiences in Madagascar—a theme which might well have had attraction for the biographer (in the Hakluyt series) of Francis Leguat.

In his careful, if not always very lucidly arranged introduction, Capt. Oliver endeavours to throw all possible doubt on Benyowski's accuracy and honesty, and in his evident prejudice against him rather, we think, overshoots his mark. Thus, for instance, he writes, "The memoirs open with a lie,"—the date of Benyowski's birth being, it seems, antedated by five years. But the memoirs really consist of two parts. The first, where this misstatement occurs, is written in the third person, and in Nicholson's edition ends with these words, reproduced by Capt. Oliver: "We shall here terminate the narrative which we have collected of the adventures of the Count, and shall relate the sequel as it is written with his own hand." It does not seem certain, therefore, that the first part was written by Benyowski himself. Capt. Oliver says the two parts cannot be separated. He, indeed, does not separate them, but whereas the first part is entitled "The Memoirs and Travels of Count Benyowski," the second (and much longer) part has in Nicholson's edition the heading "Journal of the Travels of the Count Benyowski into Siberia," &c., which heading, marking apparently where the real autobiography begins, Capt. Oliver altogether omits. And when he asserts that the story was "cunningly devised to deceive ignorant people in Europe," &c., it is right to remember that the memoirs never saw the light during their author's lifetime. Benyowski writes in a tone of the most perfect self-confidence, which is certainly justified if his account of his doings, the Siberian part especially, is even approximately true. It is probable enough, as Capt. Oliver supposes, that the importance of the part he took as a young man in the campaign against Russia is exaggerated. But it is surprising that Capt. Oliver devotes much more attention to refuting the inaccuracies of the narrative of the voyage, after the escape from Kamchatka, than to those of the previous residence in Siberia. For the discrepancies in the story of the voyage might conceivably be accounted for by the writer's ignorance of navigation, by the general confusion that then prevailed as to the regions east of Kamchatka, and, above all, by the obvious wish and intention to falsify, and thereby conceal, the route taken, possibly to avoid awkward inquiries as well as to retain a monopoly of the trade to those parts, a common, if not very honourable, practice of the time.

The most amusing part of the volume, and that in which the plain narrative of facts seems to be most liberally mingled with romance, is that in which the hero describes his life and doings in Kamchatka. His amazing fertility of resource and magical influence over his fellow men overcome the most formidable difficulties. The position of an exile was looked on as more or less disgraceful, and no social intercourse was allowed between them and the free inhabitants. Nevertheless, after their first interview, Benyowski is invited to dine by the Chancellor and the "Hettman." The Governor at once appoints him tutor to his children, and his daughter, with the mother's approval, promptly declares her affection for him. He is on arrival elected as head of the exile community, and engages them in a conspiracy to revolt and escape. The plot, in spite of the leader's marvellous address, is at last found out; his benefactor, the Governor, is killed in the fight that ensues; and Miss Aphanasia forgives him not only this, but the discovery that he has a wife in Hungary, and she is content to follow him to Europe as a daughter. As an excuse for his conduct he pleads his natural desire for liberty and his obligation to his fellow exiles, and the plea, pace Capt. Oliver, can hardly be gainsaid.

The whole story reads like an amusing and audacious fiction by Dumas; and yet there is collateral evidence to show that it is much more than founded on fact, though of the value of some of the evidence Capt. Oliver forms a far lower estimate than some other authorities. Capt. Oliver has omitted from his version some chapters descriptive of the country, which he considers mere compilation, and which anyhow are now of little intrinsic value. But he has also omitted, without any indication of the lacune, various passages from the text of the journal. These omissions may, perhaps, be considered to be covered by the words of the title-page, but such notice is hardly explicit enough. One or two of these—as, e.g., a quotation by Benyowski of Peter the Great's directions for the treatment of the exiles, and his characteristic comments on them—we are sorry to miss; but furthermore, the reader may be led to think that as far as this portion of the journal extends, the volume before us is a full reprint of Nicholson's translation, in modern form, with notes up to date.

It is to be regretted that, having taken up the subject and discussed the question of Benyowski's trustworthiness, Capt. Oliver did not see his way to investigate certain as yet unworked sources of information in Russia and Germany, and even, as he surmises, in the Dutch factory at Nagasaki; but for a volume in the "Adventure Series" this was hardly to be expected, and in that series these adventures deserve a prominent place.

NEW NOVELS.

The One too Many. By E. Lynn Linton. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Mrs. LYNN LINTON inscribes her new novel "to the sweet girls still left among us who have no part in the new revolt, but are content to be dutiful, innocent, and sheltered"; but it will need illumination as well as sweetness in any of this class to reconcile the spirit of the dedication with the apparent aim of the story. Mrs. Lynn Linton paints two types of English girlhood—the one "dutiful and innocent," the other emancipated and omniscient; and yet, although her "revolting daughter" is in many ways an entirely revolting personage, the plain person can hardly fail to rise from a perusal of the story with the impression that in the view of the writer it is wiser to revolt than to submit. Of the lucidity and force with which Mrs. Lynn Linton deals with her theme there is no question. She writes with the ease, the fluency, and the correctness born of long experience. But her portraiture was never harder in outline, nor were her colours ever more glaringly laid on. There is any amount of abrupt contrast, but no gradation of tone. Moira's long martyrdom is narrated with abundant cleverness, but the quality of inevitableness is lacking to the tragedy. It is conceivable that the story is meant to be a satire rather than a "document." If that be so, then Mrs. Lynn Linton has only herself to thank for the erroneous impression which nine out of ten readers are likely to derive from a conscientious study of her latest book.

Dorothy's Double. By G. A. Henty. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. HENTY has long since mastered the art of driving a team of energetic characters across obstacles of circumstance as difficult as anything to be found on those prairies over which Capt. Hampton pursued the absconding "double" of the lady of his love. The present narrative has much of the easy inventiveness and realism of his boys' stories, and Jacob, the captain's admiring henchman, crowlike the errand boy of a private detective, is imagined in his earlier manner. No one need be told that the march of events is animated, the villains astute and audacious, and the triumph of right signal and complete. The most ambitious conception of character is that of Linda Hawtrey, the "Sal" of the thieves and swindlers with whom she is connected, who maintains a standard of personal purity and qualified integrity in spite of disadvantages which must have crushed an ordinary girl, by virtue of an ingrained soundness and strength of character, in no way the result of any training, moral or religious. We are inclined to consider her somewhat of a moral monster, though heredity may possibly account even for a personality so unusual as hers.

A Devoted Couple. By J. Masterman. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

HEALTHY, boisterous youth and the humours of the British family generally are less often than formerly the stock-in-trade of the novelist. 'A Devoted Couple' is mostly concerned with the household affections, events, and scrapes of a brood of young Anglo-Indians called Vernons. The family consists of six boys of various ages and characters, a father, mother, and relatives galore. There is not much neat workmanship—indeed, the writing is often inept and slovenly; but there is evidence of good feeling and good spirits. As the story advances it rather improves than otherwise. A bevy of girls are introduced to mate with the boys, and several elderly couples make themselves and, apparently, others happy; and there is not a pennyworth of evil of a morbid kind in all the bustle of choosing professions, falling in love and out again, marrying and giving in marriage. The parental outlook is sufficiently sane and possible, and there is a good deal of kindly and obvious sentiment. As authors go, the writer is tender-hearted. Amongst the principals only one is killed off, if we except the villain (the horrid example of the story) and an ancient grand-aunt. More than one devoted couple appear in these pages; but it may be safely assumed that the especially devoted pair are the parents of the young Vernons. A decent position in life is the lot of most of the people presented, yet, especially at first, the tale savours a little of second-rateness.

The Ending of my Day. By Rita. 3 vols. (White & Co.)

For a girl of fourteen Belle Ffolliott must have been precocious, as at that age she committed to paper the reflections on her Aunt Tabitha with which her narrative commences. Poor Aunt Tabitha! She is of that unlovely type of Puritan which, with the possible exception of survivals in the humbler circles of Dissenters, has never existed outside the pages of a novel.

"Defend us from all such Christians! People who make life a misery and a bondage to all with whom they come in contact; who look upon children as creatures to be tyrannized over and thwarted, and ruled by rigid discipline, their natures bent into distasteful and unnatural shape, their minds and feelings cramped and tortured as the poor Chinese women torture their feet."

The severity of religious discipline, the physical inequality of the sexes, the inferiority of Christianity to "theosophy,"—these are the subjects to which Rita does now incline. And undoubtedly she makes a pitiful concatenation of circumstances wherewith to entangle her heroine. But of the moral readers will judge differently. To our mind her protests remind us of nothing so much as of one "who would call

'fire' in Noah's flood." Puritanical severity seems the last thing from which our girls and boys are suffering.

A Great Temptation. By Dora Russell. 3 vols. (White & Co.)

Mrs. RUSSELL makes another novel out of commonplace incidents, and tells it unambitiously, without any attempt to draw a new character, or an old one in a new style, or to get below the mere surface of life, at the roots and basis of things. A girl of alleged refinement and high spirit loves one man and marries another. The lover hangs round her after she is married, and the "great temptation" is to throw over the honest husband and make herself happy with the man she would not listen to when she was free. The heroine resists this temptation, but at the same time thinks it necessary to desert her husband. He had loved her from the beginning, and loves her still; but when a woman is found dead with a disfigured face he identifies his runaway wife, and marries again. These are random samples of a story which has no depth or distinction, but which may none the less serve the purpose of those who produce and those who read it.

A Ward in Chancery. By Mrs. Alexander. 2 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

FOR pictures of English middle-class life, exactly as it is, with all its virtues and its drawbacks, Mrs. Alexander is not often surpassed, even by writers who have a literary style and greater gifts at their service. She is not an artist, but she is an admirable photographer, especially when a little malice and a spice of revolt are mingled with her work. 'A Ward in Chancery' is not so lively as its predecessors, and the heroine can hardly be called interesting. But how lifelike and how depressing is the picture of her uncle the solicitor's household! Into this well-regulated establishment Andrée Nugent is brought as a newly made heiress, the rehabilitated orphan of a step-brother who had been the black sheep of the family during his spendthrift existence in Paris. Here she awaits her majority, and tries to adapt herself for a time to the Landons' existence. The worship of aristocracy, of money, and of respectability which stamps so large a class in England is depicted without exaggeration. Perhaps the best feature in the story is the vague longing for an existence more picturesque, even mildly Bohemian, which is also characteristic of the younger generation, who really shrink back at once from any approach to realizing their dreams. Mr. Thurston, who represents Andrée's dream, is certainly not a very imaginative being.

The Standishs of High Acre. By Gilbert Sheldon. (Cassell & Co.)

YET another instance of the modern novelist's affection for pseudo-scientific aspects of humanity is to be found in 'The Standishs of High Acre.' The moving idea is the popular one—heredity—with a freak of atavism thrown in. To these the author has added a sort of Montague-Capulet feud between two ancient English families, which, truth to say, appears a good deal out of date. There is enough and to spare of determined gloom and deadly grimness. But, as is often the case with an artificial atmosphere of darkness and despair, it fails to take hold on the reader very strongly. Ralph Standish has moments not wanting in force and poignancy, and the picture as a whole is intensely melancholy. But he and his father are each more suited to serve as "cases" in a medical record of hallucinations, strange delusions, and outright madness than to figure as principals in a novel. There are times when their diseased conditions are so overdone that where the situation is meant to be most strongly dramatic it verges on burlesque. It must be granted that the old house and the old servants are occasionally striking, and have touches that serve to recall a certain masterpiece styled 'Wuthering Heights,' or at least to point the contrast between it and work like 'The Standishes.'

Inscrutable. By Eamé Stuart. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)

'INSCRUTABLE' is exciting enough reading to please at least one "jaded reviewer." Though captious critics carp at the explanation of the mystery, we shall be silent. If throughout a volume the reader has been more or less mystified, interested, or surprised, it is ungrateful to complain, though the author's skill has brought about such a result by means that do not bear looking into. Most unravellings lead to disappointment. To us it seems that the general setting of this story is striking. The old English cathedral town, the River Gate House, and the mysterious tenant of the Oriental chambers are well, because weirdly, presented. Garrick Bloodworth, his exits and entrances, and his old servants are strongly imagined, and belong to the sensational order of romance. The discovery of the actual working of the plot we leave, as in duty bound, to the grateful or ungrateful reader. The River Gate House is not quite another House on the Marsh; but it has some of the elements of mystery and surprise contained therein. Miss Stuart may be congratulated on a certain power of astonishing. The "shocker" that shocks is, after all, not too common.

The Queen against Owen. By Allen Upward. (Chatto & Windus.)

"THE crime of murder remains, after all is said and done, the one thing which most fascinates the public mind." Such is the author's opinion, and further, he holds that a bare report of an imaginary trial for the crime is enough to provide interest for a work of fiction. Never a forensic gentleman "kept the roadway" better than he. His best points are a professional contempt for juries, of whose discussion of their verdict he makes very good fun, and an appreciative estimate of such men of leading as "Sir Stephen James" and the suave Lord Christobel. (The resemblance traced in the latter dignitary to "the Gascoignes of another age" seems a trifle far-fetched.) Forensic also is the rather thin fun about javelin-men and the archaic formulae of the commission, and a certain flippancy of humour generally. But slight as is the narrative it never flags, and "the public mind" may be pleasantly titillated by a very realistic representation of a criminal trial. The realism, however, would have been even more convincing had Tressamor been able to account for the immunity from interruption he experienced when making three several journeys of four miles in the course of the night of the murder in order to dispose of the corpse, when it was in evidence that two other persons were on the road at the time. It will be seen that our difficulty is a tribute to the ingenuity of the plot.

Mrs. Thorndale's Cousin. By E. M. Bagot. (Fisher Unwin.)

'MRS. THORNDALE'S COUSIN' reveals some quiet observation of manners and character. It is a pity that the execution is at times faulty, and the canvas overcrowded. The group of town and county folk makes a rather confused picture, in which no one person stands out with sufficient clearness. Mrs. Thorndale and Mrs. Adam Forsythe are amongst those best observed; the Poldwhellers have also an air of reality, and one or two more are treated in a way that just recalls, and no more, the manner of Miss Austen. We fancy the author has something to learn in the matter of arrangement and diction, and the writing rather suggests "gloves" in places. The story being of a quiet, unexciting type, it strikes us that the sudden fire and the struggle in the meadow are a little bit out of place.

"Zorg": a Story of British Guiana. By Vernon Kirke. (Digby, Long & Co.)

If the monosyllabic title 'Zorg' does not mean sorrow (we suspect it does), we give it up. It is a tale of sorrow, at any rate, rather unskillfully told. The first half is autobiographical, then it turns impersonal, till finally the heroine resumes the narrative up to her death. This helps to make a lack of force and unity. The story is not improbably a first adventure in fiction by a young writer. The best of it is, we fancy, when the author keeps closest to her experience. The scenes in British Guiana have a more lifelike air than those laid in England. In the former the heroine maintains her identity better than elsewhere. When she deserts her lover through the influence of a certain Sister Agnes, an Anglo-Catholic lady given to good works and not at all afraid of interfering in people's destinies, we feel that the natural evolution of a character has been destroyed. The book is short, but it has a good deal of sentiment, passion, and other youthful and rather fatiguing elements, not well put together. 'Zorg' has, however, a suggestion of temperament and feeling, though it is very imperfectly realized.

THE LITERATURE OF SPORT.

EVERY sportsman should keep with scrupulous care a diary or register of the fish or game which he kills, and a note of the persons who formed the party, of the locality, and of any occurrences at all unusual or abnormal. Such a record becomes more interesting the longer it is kept, and may eventually in various ways become a source of profit. Hence, looking on The Fly-fisher's Register, arranged by W. H. Pope (Sampson Low & Co.), as an inducement to keep such a record, we may at this season, when fancy turns lightly to fishing, bid it welcome.

The arrangement of headings is more suited for a dry-fly trout angler than for a salmon fisher; but even for the former the distribution of space does not commend itself to our ideas. The scoffer will note with glee that the largest space is allotted to the heading "Total Weight of Fish," an item which, even with the best will on the angler's part to increase it, has ordinarily an unfortunate way of confining itself to the most modest dimensions.

We may not nowadays discuss the question as to what forms of sport should or should not be followed by ladies; they, or at any rate the up-to-date portion of them—the progressives, in fact, if we may borrow from the vocabulary of the London County Council—have settled that question for themselves, deciding apparently in favour of so extensive a programme as to make a "Badminton Library" of their own ere long a necessity. A step in this direction is furnished by a number of clever sketches of sports and pastimes entitled Ladies in the Field, edited by Lady Greville (Ward & Downey). To it the inexperienced may apply with confidence and without fear of betrayal. The type and paper are excellent, and the book is well turned out, though a few mistakes have escaped observation, such as Selby Lowndes (p. 35) and Lancaster (p. 186). Names so well known among sportsmen should not have been misspelt.

It is fortunate that one has seldom to try to consider fairly and review adequately a book in which so many different subjects are dealt with, in ways varying from that of an expert to that of a blind guide, as are to be found collected under the title of Gold, Sport, and Coffee-planting in Mysore, by Robert H. Elliot (Constable & Co.). It is, however, right to say at once that the chapters on gold-mining, coffee-planting, and scenery (and they form the greater part of the book) seem good, and probably will prove of value to those who may choose Mysore as a field of enterprise. And certainly, if we may trust the author, coffee-planting there appears to be an excellent opening for young men who are prepared to work, the tenure of the properties being sufficiently secure and the prospect of profit more than ordinarily encouraging. This alone should secure for the book the benevolent attention of paterfamilias. Mr. Elliot from personal knowledge relates a case in which a friend bought 240 acres of good coffee land for Rs. 98,000, which he borrowed at 8 per cent. In four years the debt was reduced to Rs. 68,000, and he bought 163 acres more for Rs. 13,250, for which he paid the same rate. He had, of course, good and bad times, but by 1887-88 the whole debt, principal and interest, was paid off, and a considerable balance remained. "In 1889-90 the property gave him a clear profit of 3,350l., and it has done well ever since." This may, no doubt, have been an exceptional case, but it is estimated that from a good estate of 200 acres a profit of from 1,500l. to 2,000l. a year may be anticipated. And these figures, we may point out, represent gold; for the coffee is sold in England, and such money as the planter requires is remitted to India at the exchange of the day, so that he is in the pleasing position to profit more and more as the rupee falls in gold value. We next consider the four chapters in which Mysore, its government, and its game are described. They vary in merit, but are generally interesting and fairly trustworthy. In these days of easy transit to India it is strange to read of Sir Mark Cubbon, who, having gone out in 1800 apparently, governed Mysore for about twenty-eight years, and died on his way home in 1861, having served all those years without returning to England. Concerning the government, Mr. Elliot remarks that at first the people viewed with apprehension the transfer of the administration from the Government of India to the Maharaja, but that the native management is now popular and successful. The information regarding sport may be called generally useful, and it is probably true that the "paradox" gun is the best weapon for jungle work. As is usual in Madras, wild cattle are called bison, for the same reason presumably that Americans call their bison buffaloes; and there is mention of snakes. Why is it that these unpleasant creatures so often lend themselves to strange stories? Lastly, there are three chapters in which, amongst other things, the effect of the introduction of English capital into Mysore, famine, a permanent settlement, caste, Christianity, the deterioration of natives from contact with Europeans, infanticide, and the great silver question are examined in a way somewhat bewildering, judgment being pronounced with too much certainty. But it is remarkable that whilst in many cases the reasoning is curious, and, if we may say so without offence, the writer apparently somewhat out of his depth, yet not unfrequently he appears, by a process which we cannot trace, to arrive at sound conclusions. We cannot, however, after the experience in Bengal, agree with him in advocating a permanent settlement of the land revenue. If the demand or land tax be fixed for thirty years, surely that is a period long enough to encourage the construction of wells and other improvements; if not, let the term be extended; but under no circumstances should the hands of future governments be permanently fettered. Again, famine may, like war and pestilence, be a means whereby nature maintains equilibrium between the demand of population for food and the supply which the earth can yield, and caution in interference is clearly necessary. Regarding caste the author discourses much, and states that the word means colour. It would be interesting to know whence this information is derived, for we have hitherto believed the word to mean class, breed, family, race, or species, and to be derived from the Portuguese casta. These subjects and the silver question are altogether too intricate to be satisfactorily disposed of in a work like the present, though many of the author's remarks deserve respectful consideration. He is pleased with Mysore because it is "out of reach of the faddists of the House of Commons," and "free from the only danger which threatens India—the sacrifice of its interests to serve party ends"; and displeased with the financial policy of the Government of India, which he says is so rotten that "it is impossible to find a single redeeming feature in the measure that has been adopted." There are many who agree with him in this opinion.

American Big Game Hunting (Edinburgh, Douglas) is a work published by the Boone and Crockett Club of New York, and edited by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Grinnell. The editors supply a sketch of the club and its objects, which are most admirable. They may be summarized as designed to encourage true sport and hinder the indiscriminate slaughter of game. In many parts of the Western States, where the larger game used to abound, it has become very rare. There are parts of the vast American continent in which wild animals are plentiful and which are but imperfectly explored. To encourage their exploration is one of the club's objects. The introduction and enforcement of game laws is another. In several States there are stringent laws for the preservation of game; but they are disregarded with impunity. Indeed, it is too common for Americans to place a law on the statute-book and to conclude that nothing more needs be done. The State of Maine has strictly enforced the laws for the preservation of game, which were framed in a sensible spirit. The result has been that, during the last twenty years, moose, caribou, and deer have increased in number. The members of this club have executed original exploration and produced maps of the newly traversed regions. The work of the club is excellent, and this volume is a useful contribution to the literature of sport. The illustrations are also good.

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

Satirical Poems of the Time of the Reformation. Edited by James Cranston, LL.D. 2 vols. (Scottish Text Society).—"Here am I; where are you!" say Scottish children of a cake with very few plums in it. There are not many plums in the 'Satirical Poems,' and Dr. Cranston has not thought fit to indicate the few there are. It seems a pity, for no one else surely will ever study these forty-eight pieces with half the diligence that he must have spent upon them. They cover the period 1565-84, and fill 411 pages; the notes, the glossary, and the index of proper names occupy volume ii., of 374 more pages. Whether it was necessary to furnish a note on Luther ("one of the greatest figures in the Protestant revolution, born 10th December [sic], 1483; died 18th February, 1546"), or on Virgil, Nero, &c., is open to doubt; "Schir Frances Russell" (No. 39, l. 139) to us seems rather to have called for annotation. "Eum" in No. 42, l. 293, must be a misprint for can; to say that Kirkcaldy of Grange was "banished to France" is something more than misleading; we have no conception what is meant by his joining "in 1566 the conspiracy against Bothwell"; to entertain the idea that Sempill can have been one of the captains at the siege of Edinburgh Castle is to run counter to Sempill's own assertion (No. 39, l. 122); and no one believes now in the genuineness of Bothwell's 'Testament' (vol. ii. p. 54). Otherwise Dr. Cranston has approved himself a most painstaking and accurate editor; only we cannot be sure whether his labours might not have been better directed. The prefatory note makes promise of "several MS. poems of considerable interest"; it goes on to state that "most of the pieces, as will be seen from the bibliographical notes, have been issued in some form or other." For the MS. poems thus promised we have made diligent but fruitless search; the second statement, however, is amply verified. Forty-six, indeed, of the forty-eight pieces had been reprinted in modern collections—thirty-eight of them in 'The Sempill Ballades,' edited by Thomas George Stevenson (Edinburgh, 1872). No doubt they are more correctly reprinted here; still, the question arises whether many of them were worth reprinting at all. And to that question we are inclined to give a decided negative. A good many elegies on royal personages published during this nineteenth century will not merit republication about the year 2200; Nos. 18 and 30 here, and several others, are just doggerel elegies, as little satires as they are poetry. Fifty pages would have well sufficed for the historical plums of these pieces, and less than fifty for such linguistic ones as "round Robene" and "Allit him for with aill and wyne." Of the historical we have noted six; and though there are doubtless more, there are not many more, we are confident. No. 10, l. 14, gives a new date, 1531, for Moray's birth (instead of "about 1533"); and No. 9, ll. 219-222, tells how Moray's mother was known to have wrought by rings and witchcraft to divert James V.'s affections from Mary of Guise. The twelfth stanza of No. 3 (1567) contrasts Queen Mary's activity after the slaughter of Rizzio with her slackness to avenge her husband's murder; and l. 53 of No. 7 (also 1567) contains an obvious allusion to the sixth of the Casket Letters. No. 33, ll. 165-174, gives a curious account of the shameful condition of the parish kirks in 1572; and No. 42, l. 100, puts the number of the Scottish preachers in that same year as "far within twa hundreth men." This is, of course, a misstatement, for five years before that date the General Assembly contained 252 ministers and 467 readers; still it is interesting, like the whole of the dialogue in which it occurs, especially in view of the Jesuits' report, translated by Father Stevenson, which deals with the order to assign four parish churches to each of the ministers.

Mr. WILLIAM WALLACE in Scotland Yesterday (Hodder & Stoughton) gives eleven character-sketches, which "are studies, not photographs," from the typical village of "St. Ber's by the Sea," and ten from the typical country town of "Carricktown." The latter stands plainly for Ayr, and the former even more plainly for Culross; while "Kingsheart" can only be Dunfermline, though we know not what "king bequeathed his heart" thereto. One rather uncommon touch of nature is common to many of the characters, that they all are, or turn, teetotallers—the Poacher, the Fisherman, the Orra Man, the Moral Force, the Dressmaker's Husband, the Village Hampden, the Shabby Scientist, the Clergyman of all Work, and even the Bibulous Scientist. This strikes one as strange in the Scotland of yesterday; but stranger still must have been Mr. Wallace's own career. He would seem to have been born about the year 1810, to have been writing verse before Tennyson published his first volume, to have been in the habit a little later of playing whist (short whist) with the "Carricktown" writer, doctor, and mathematical master, and yet for some unexplained reason to have been kept at school till he must have been well over thirty—till "Scott had long gone to the majority," till "Macaulay was one of the members for Edinburgh," till the 'Lady of Lyons' was "in the flush of its popularity,"—nay, till Edinburgh possessed a normal school. Now, we would not vex an octogenarian with impertinent questions; else we should like to know why after his death the Orra Man's legs insisted on remaining grotesquely drunk, whether four-o'clock tea was usual among doctors before 1851, why one old lady should have collected a pope's chair and a cardinal's hat, and another two cardinals' chairs, why the eldest son of an earl was "strictly" styled "the Hon. Frank Lochlea," how frogs show their preference for earth, and lastly, what is meant by the statement that "she was, for a woman, but also for reasons which I was not slow to divine, remarkably well acquainted with certain passages in ancient history."

Burns's Chloris: a Reminiscence, by James Adams, M.D. (Glasgow, Morison), is based on one brief interview that its author had as a schoolboy, sixty-four years ago, with Jean Lorimer (1775-1831), the "Lassie wi' the lint-white locks." She was born at Craighieburn, near Moffat, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, who failed, however, in 1796; three years before that date she had contracted an unfortunate Gretna Green marriage with a spendthrift young farmer of the name of Whelpdale. The last nine years of her life were spent in Edinburgh. There is little enough here to fill nearly 200 quarto pages, but that little is eked out with the thirty-one poems in which during 1793-95 Burns celebrated his platonic passion, with a chapter to prove that Burns was "much misunderstood," and with an appendix. Dr. Adams does not seem to be aware that one of the identical "lint-white locks" is enshrined in the Burns Monument at Edinburgh, along with a fragment of a scone of Jean Armour's baking.

Messrs. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. deserve considerable credit for the delicately archaic printing and general presentment of a new edition of the Poems of James Thomson, Weaver of Kildruth (originally published in 1801). It is everything that is desirable with regard to type and margin, and we have detected one instance only in which the letters "f" and "ff" have produced their usual confusion. Whether the 'Poems' were quite worth reproduction as literature is another matter. James "the leam" was a rustic character, the "akeely" person of his neighbourhood—could let blood, kill a "mart," and set or wield a razor. He seems to have been a studious youth, and much devoted to the works of Allan Ramsay. He early acquired a facility in the national metres, and the anxiety of his educated neighbours (to judge by the subscription list) not to miss the opportunity of doing justice to a peasant poet seems to have led them to fancy they had discovered a new Burns in the Lothians. His character, which combined native shrewdness with some literary taste, was probably more impressive than any of his verses. These are chiefly valuable as evidence of the extent to which the fondness for metre was a popular gift in what has been thought a dark period of literature in Scotland, and as throwing light upon some of the thoughts and feelings of the writer's age and class. The dearth of provisions (these were the days of the meal riots at Leith, and the nearly fatal cry of "licht baps!"), the expense and chicanery (real or supposed) of the law, the atrocities of the resurrection men, and the desire for small holdings, or garden ground, are among his topics:—

Tell ye the lairds, balth ae and a',
To let their grund in pieces sma'.
An acre, or it may be twa',
As bodie's need it.

But Thomson was loyal to "George the Three."

Some faebous aibours we're at hame,
Are mair than a' the French to blame;
I wonder much they blink nae shame,
Ungratefu' pack!
To o' our Constitution lame,
A bonny crack!

He had a more imaginative side. 'Winter' and 'December' show him to have had the sympathetic outlook on nature which is more common or more articulate among the Northern peasantry than in the South ("The sun was wearing down the waist" is a typical line, for instance); and in the other endowment of his countrymen, the humour which works up to an anticlimax in such pieces as 'The Ghast' and 'The Hare'—the last a dry reflection on his neighbours' belief in witchcraft—his excellence will be appreciated by those who can estimate aright the language which imparts half the flavour to his satire. These and certain dialogues, as that 'Between Two Old Wives' and 'The Crow and the Muircock,' which must be read through, and do not admit quotation, atone for much that was not worth preserving. On the whole, Thomson was a sound and cheerful moralist, and looked beyond temporary troubles:—

Contentment's na in worldly things,
Unto themselves they a' take wings;
The best o' friends at times are fickle;
It's na the rose without the pickle.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

In his capacity of the most active member, for a great number of years, of the Commons Preservation Society, Mr. Shaw Lefevre has published, through Messrs. Cassell & Co., English Commons and Forests: the Story of the Battle during the last Thirty Years for Public Rights over the Commons and Forests of England and Wales. No man has done more to educate the public in the need for keeping open the commons than Mr. Shaw Lefevre, and no one has helped the cause more actively in Parliament, with the single exception of the late Prof. Fawcett. The volume is interesting, and forms a very adequate history of the movement, and it is, as might be expected, accurate at all points, although the account of the famous Wisley case puts a new complexion on that matter. This beautiful common on the Guildford road was, we had always understood, to have been enclosed at the suggestion of Mr. Charles Buxton, who, together with the other members of his family, was a strong advocate of the maintenance of suburban commons as places of public recreation; and the suggestion conveyed in Mr. Fawcett's speeches was that Mr. Buxton wished to have the common enclosed virtually for the purpose of what is now known as regulation. Mr. Fawcett, in opposing the enclosure, never questioned the excellent motives of Mr. Buxton, but thought that the plan which he proposed might lead in the long run to the loss of the common. Mr. Lefevre, however, says of Wisley, "It was very near to Fox Warren, the residence of the late Mr. Charles Buxton, and through him the inexpediency of the enclosure of this Common became generally known." We have no doubt that Mr. Lefevre is justified in this statement, and the facts must be within his knowledge; and we only name them because they form the sole point in his valuable book in which his information appears in any degree to conflict with that hitherto in the possession of the public.

MR. JOHN ASHTON's latest volume, Varia (Ward & Downey), makes, as usual, amusing reading, though its permanent value, we fear, cannot be said to be great. It deals with subjects so diverse as miniature theatres for children, the Duke of Gloucester, son of Queen Anne and the Prince of Denmark, Richard Cromwell, Greensted Church, Benvenuto Cellini, and so forth. The best paper is that on the extraordinary impostor Mary Baker, who induced many worthy people to believe that she was princess of a mysterious country known as Javasu. We must confess that the sketch of Richard Cromwell appears rather trivial, and most of the charm has disappeared from Mr. Ashton's condensation of Benvenuto Cellini's autobiography. Per contra, 'Pepys and Music' forms a judicious series of extracts from the famous diary. Also the writer puts his antiquarian knowledge to good use in a dissertation on that curious Essex church with the nave of split trees, though, of necessity, the mystery of its construction remains practically unsolved. Altogether, more pretentious works than this would find it much harder to justify their existence.

A GENERATION has passed since the first edition, in four volumes, of Sir William Muir's Life of Mahomet appeared in 1861. It reached a second edition, shorn of some preliminary chapters on early Arabian history, and condensed into a single volume, in 1877; and now, after another long interval, it has entered upon its third issue, which Messrs. Smith & Elder have just sent to us. The present edition is, to all intents and purposes, a reproduction of that published in 1877. An appendix has been transferred to the introduction; and a few omissions, together with a slight condensation in the type-setting, reduce the volume by about thirty pages. But though a reproduction, it is not a mere reprint. Sir William Muir has evidently gone carefully over every sentence, verified his facts, and criticized his style; and the result is in every respect an improvement. The book, which was always well written as well as scholarly, now reads more smoothly; the author's judgments seem to have mellowed with age; some rather intolerant criticisms of the Prophet from a dogmatic theologian's standpoint have been wisely dropped out; and the whole work has gained in point both of literature and biography. The chief new features, beyond textual revision, are some excellent illustrations of Mecca and Medina and a full index. In its present perfected form all students of Islam will cordially welcome what is undoubtedly the standard life of Mohammed in English. Its faults and limitations are known; but it is not the less a work of great learning, sound criticism, and considerable literary charm.

"MEN OF ACHIEVEMENT" is a new series of Transatlantic manufacture, although Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. put their names. Two volumes are before us: Men of Business, by Mr. W. O. Stoddard, and Inventors, by Mr. P. G. Hubert. They contain short biographies of American worthies. Mr. Hubert has the more attractive subject, and the cuts in his book are good, while the portraits in Mr. Stoddard's are, probably owing to the badness of the originals, decidedly depressing; and although

Mr. Stoddard writes in good taste, can memoirs of men whose chief claim to consideration usually is that they amassed money be made other than dreary reading?

DR. WHYTE'S Bunyan Characters, of which Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier send us a second series, show a good deal of rhetorical ability and clever sketching of character. They are called lectures, but south of the Tweed they might pass for sermons.

MR. GOSWIP has written and Mr. E. Arnold has published The Chess Pocket Manual, a neatly printed little volume, well fitted to serve as a manual of reference.

MR. SANDFORD MARTIN'S Windfalls of Observation (Dent & Co.) do not often rise above the commonplace; his essays are pleasant enough reading as colloquial gossip from one of ourselves on staple topics of conversation. They have the air of being common-sense résumés, by a practical man of the world who is comfortably off, of the magazine articles that have appeared lately: for example, there is a paper on 'Marriage and Divorce,' in which Mrs. Mona Caird is controverted; on 'A Post and not Ashamed,' beginning with an anecdote of Tennyson; and 'The Question of an Occupation,' which suggests titles like 'What shall We do with our Boys?' Their great merit is that they do not give the reader any unsatisfactory sense of inferiority to the writer, but rather afford the pleasant glow which results from feeling that you have been thinking the same all along. Occasionally Mr. Martin hits off a fairly happy phrase, like: "Of course, cocktails are detestable things to drink at all times, and thrice and four times detestable in office hours, but there are occasions when one's feelings seem to demand some reasonable disarrangement of the insides as an aid to expression"; but the conversational style sometimes degenerates into distasteful Americanisms. The book is got up in the tasteful way to which Messrs. Dent have accustomed us.

The Statesman's Year-Book, although it has always been the best of books of reference, continues to improve where improvement seemed hardly possible. It is published, as usual, by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., and continues to be edited by Mr. J. Scott Keltie. The only criticism that we are able to offer on the present occasion is that the books of reference of a non-official kind named in the case of certain countries are not in all cases well chosen, or should form a fuller list. For example, taking Tunis, the best of all the books is one which is not mentioned, written, as is well known, by Baron B. Constant d'Estournelles, now of the French Embassy in London; and the list for Switzerland does not contain several excellent American and other works upon that country, published within the last two or three years. But it is necessary, indeed, to work hard to pick holes successfully in 'The Statesman's Year-Book,' which is, and we hope will long remain, a credit to the country of its production.

The Official Year-Book of the Church of England (S.P.C.K.) is improving. There is still too much raw material: prospectuses, for example, printed entire or nearly so, which, with a little trouble, the editor might recast into a shorter form; but, on the whole, the information is given in a more condensed shape than it used to be.—We have frequently had occasion to praise The Clergy Directory (Phillips) for its compact arrangement and cheapness, and it well deserves notice as a useful and handy volume.

Dod's Parliamentary Companion for 1894 will, of course, be as largely used as have been its predecessors; but we note that the electorate is stated in the present issue at the same figures that were given last year, and has not been brought up to date, and that several small misprints are continued. This being the most useful and portable of all the many parliamentary handbooks, it is specially important that it should be always accurate. It is published, as usual, by Messrs. Whitaker & Co.

Stand Fast, Craig Rouston! is the latest addition to Messrs. Low & Co.'s popular issue of Mr. W. Black's romances.—Pietro Ghisleri, by Mr. Marion Crawford, has been reissued in one volume by Messrs. Macmillan.—Messrs. Putnam send us a neat edition in two volumes of The Home, by Fredrika Bremer, Mary Howitt's translation. We have to thank the same publishers for handsome illustrated editions of Mrs. Elliot's Old Court Life in France and Knickerbocker's History of New York. The elaborate reprint of Irving's classic work is adorned with extremely clever cuts by Mr. Kemble, and is a good specimen of what an American press can achieve in the way of luxury.—The Tract Society sends us a new edition of its Annotated Paragraph Bible, a handsome volume marred by the retention of exploded views in the prefaces.

THE last two numbers of the Revue de Paris (Asher & Co.) confirm the favourable impression made by the first. The Balzac letters have continued interesting, and Augier's proverbe is a decided "find."—We have also received from Socetti & Co., of Bucharest, several numbers of the Buletinul Oficial of the Roumanian Minister of Public Instruction. It is, we fear, a publication that will hardly interest many people in this country, but it shows that much activity in educational matters exists in Roumania.—A word of praise is due to the Allgemeine Buchhändlerzeitung, sent to us by Mr. C. F. Müller, of Leipzig, which promises to prove a useful and intelligent organ of the trade.

We have received, rather late in the day, the Report of the Holloway College for 1893. It is meagre, and calls for little remark; but it is satisfactory to observe that, although the College is still unknown to the general public, the number of students steadily increases.

We have on our table Tennyson, Poet, Philosopher, Idealist, by J. C. Walters (Kegan Paul),—Rambles in Historic Lands, by P. J. Hamilton (Putnam),—The Private Life of the Romans, by H. W. Preston and L. Dodge (Boston, U.S.A., Leach & Co.),—Industrial Arbitration and Conciliation, compiled by J. S. Lowell (Putnam),—A Wild Sheep Chase, translated from the French of E. Bergerat (Seecley),—Interesting and Characteristic Anecdotes of Burns, edited by J. Ingram (Simpkin),—Drawing and Design, by E. R. Taylor (Macmillan),—The Humour of Holland, translated by A. 'RARE EDITIONS.'

Edinburgh, March 8, 1894.

WILL you allow me space to make some criticisms of and corrections on a recently published work entitled 'Rare Editions,' by J. H. Slater? I confine my criticism to those chapters with the contents of which I am most familiar.

The compiler's first misstatement occurs in the preface, where we learn that early editions of Scott are in no demand. This idea is now very much out of date, as those works are rapidly increasing in value, and the first edition of 'Waverley' in boards, of which 1,000 copies were printed, is alone worth 10*l*.

The opening chapter of Mr. Slater's book treats of Ainsworth's novels, but we are not told that 'Guy Fawkes' and 'Old St. Paul's' were both published serially in Ainsworth's Magazine; and the same omission occurs in the case of 'The Miser's Daughter,' 'Windoor Castle,' 'St. James's,' and 'James II.' In regard to Ainsworth's Magazine Mr. Slater says very little, although it would have been interesting to note that the serials 'Modern Chivalry,' illustrated by George Cruikshank, and 'Revolutions of London,' illustrated by Phiz, both written by Ainsworth, have not been since published in book form. Mr. Slater should also have discovered that the Lawrence copy of the magazine, in original cloth, complete, was sold at Sotheby's in 1892 for 40*l*. This is the only complete uncut set I have heard of. My own set wants the last two volumes, and I have been ten years searching for them. The first 8vo. edition of 'The Miser's Daughter,' in cloth, is worth much more than 30*s*.; and 'Mervyn Clitheroe,' the later parts of which were issued in blue (not yellow) wrappers, would command probably twice 20*s*. in original cloth. I should also like to know when a copy of 'Windoor Castle,' in parts, has ever been sold for 4*l*. 4*s*. My copy of 'The Flitch of Bacon' is in blue cloth, Mr. Slater says red cloth; and 'Ovingdean Grange' contains woodcuts, not plates.

Dealing with original editions of Dickens, Mr. Slater, who is apparently quite unaware that 'The Library of Fiction' was first published in monthly parts, tells us that that work in cloth is worth 3*l*. 3*s*. Personally, I know of only two copies that have occurred at book sales in recent years, both in 1889. The first, the Mackenzie copy in morocco, cost me 13*l*., and later on Mr. Burnett's copy (cut down) sold for 5*l*. Mr. Sabin in his last catalogue (December) prices a copy at 8*l*.

We next read that the three-volume edition of 'Sketches by Boz' is to be had at 9*l*., and are told of an exceptional copy which in 1892 realized 28*l*. 10*s*. In 1889 the Mackenzie copy sold for 30*l*., the Burnett copy for 25*l*. 10*s*., and in December last a medium copy sold at Sotheby's for 15*l*. 15*s*. Mr. Sabin prices a copy in his last catalogue at 30*l*. The first 8vo. edition was issued in brown (not green) cloth, and 5*l*., Mr. Slater's value, is below the mark. A copy was sold in December at Sotheby's for 13*l*., and Mr. Burnett's copy in morocco fetched 17*l*. 10*s*. Mr. Slater also values this edition in parts at 15*l*. 15*s*. In Mr. Sabin's last catalogue a copy is priced at 40*l*.

The Pailthorpe illustrations to 'Oliver Twist' were published in 1866, not 1866; and I do not believe that the first edition of 'Memoirs of Grimaldi' will ever be procured for 5*l*.—It has never happened so far—nor can the 'Picnic Papers, 1841,' in cloth, be had for 3*l*. 3*s*. My own copy of this last work cost 8*l*. 10*s*. at Sotheby's, and I see it priced in a recent catalogue at 12*l*. 12*s*. Perhaps Mr. Slater could also tell us when a copy of 'A Curious Dance round a Curious Tree' has been sold at 2*l*. 10*s*.

Passing on to Charles Lever's works, I cannot agree with Mr. Slater that the average value of 'Con Cregan' in parts is 4l. 10s. At a very poor sale in December last a copy in this state sold for 5l. 17s. 6d., and the book was recently catalogued at 12l. 12s. My own copy in cloth cost 5l. 5s. Most collectors would also like to know where to procure copies of 'A Day's Ride' at 1l. 1s., 'A Rent in a Cloud' at 1l., and 'Paul Goslett's Confessions' at 1l. 5s. In the chapter devoted to Albert Smith, Mr. Slater does not mention that 'The Scattergood Family' originally appeared in Bentley's Miscellany, nor does he refer to the 1844 edition of 'The Wassail Bowl' in one volume, although he makes special note of an edition published in 1848.

The chapter describing Surtees's works contains greater inaccuracies than any I have yet pointed out. To begin with, I very much doubt if there is any second edition of 'Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities' with the Phiz plates. The edition of 1843 (the first with the Alken plates) bears the words "second edition," both on the title-page and coloured frontispiece, and has never yet sold in cloth so low as 8l. My own copy cost me at the Burnett sale 9l., and a poor copy was recently sold at Sotheby's for 10l. We are also told that 'Hawbuck Grange' appeared in Bell's Life in 1846-7, instead of 1846-7, and that the reprint was published in 1888 and illustrated by Wildrake, Heath, and Jellicoe. As a matter of fact the first reprint was in 1884 (undated), with coloured reprints of the original etchings by Phiz. The work has never been illustrated by Wildrake, Heath, and Jellicoe. Coming to 'Sponge's Sporting Tour,' the first of Surtees's novels containing John Leech's illustrations, Mr. Slater refers us to another imaginary reprint containing illustrations by Wildrake, &c., and the same mistake occurs in his notice of 'Handley Cross.' No mention is made of the interesting 1860 reprint of 'Sponge's Sporting Tour,' or of the 1872 reprint of the set of five volumes illustrated by Leech. Odd parts of 'Handley Cross' are very rare, not "comparatively common," and the volume in cloth will never be procured for 2l. 10s.

In the chapter on Thackeray I entirely disagree with the value placed upon 'Pendennis' in parts, viz., 2l. 10s. The last copy sold by auction realized 5l. 5s. in 1889.

In a work such as this of Mr. Slater's, published at the high price of one guinea, readers naturally expect some degree of completeness as well as accuracy; but the book is singularly incomplete, inasmuch as there is no reference whatever even to the principal works which come under the general headings of Cruikshankiana and John Leech. Most collectors would also wish to learn something of the works of John Heneage Jesse and others of his school, whose books are in much greater demand than those of many authors very fully detailed in Mr. Slater's list.

C. E. S. CHAMBERS.

BACON AND BARTHOLOMEW ANGLICUS.

Oxford, March 13, 1894.

I AM sure that readers of the Athenæum must desire that my correspondence with Mr. Robert Steele should be brought to a close. I have to thank my courteous antagonist for furnishing his last letter with references; but while I have never contended in favour of any definite identification of Roger Bacon's Parisian teacher, I do not think that Mr. Steele's restatement of his original opinions strengthens the case for Bartholomew Anglicus. A teacher who held a position of eminence in the greatest age of the leading university of Europe would, I submit, have his work there attested by more ample authority than the bare statement of a single Italian chronicler. But even if I could persuade myself that Mr. Steele's personal criteria tended towards Bartholomew, I should still be as far as ever from believing that the character of his work satisfied Bacon's conditions.

REGINALD L. POOLE.

DR. W. F. POOLE.

THE profession of librarianship has sustained a great loss by the unexpected death of William Frederick Poole, LL.D., Librarian of the Newberry Library, Chicago, just reported from America. Dr. Poole's name was a household word in almost every English or American library of any extent on account of the index to Anglo-American periodical literature, originally commenced by him single-handed upon a small scale, and eventually developed under his direction into an extensive work, invaluable in itself, and hitherto the most important instance of successful co-operation in library matters. This, however, was only one out of many claims to notice and public gratitude.

Born at Salem, Massachusetts, December 24th, 1821, he studied at Yale College, where he became the intimate friend of the late Henry Stevens, of Vermont, and was partly influenced by him in taking up librarianship as his life's work. While still at college he became librarian to the "Brothers in Unity" Literary Society, and prepared an index to periodical literature of 154 pages, expanded to 521 in the second edition of 1853, which, when issued with the co-operation of the American and British library associations in 1882, occupied 1,469 pages, and has since been continued by supplementary volumes.

After holding an assistant librarianship at the Boston Athenæum, and the librarianship of the Boston Mercantile Library, where he published a dictionary catalogue on the "title-aline" principle, he was from 1856 to 1869 librarian of the Boston Athenæum, which position he quitted in the latter year to undertake as an expert the organization of smaller libraries in various parts of the country. Within less than a year he performed this office for six libraries, and, still in 1869, commenced as librarian the organization of the Cincinnati Public Library, which was erected during his term of office. In 1873 he undertook a similar task at Chicago, and in 1887 he quitted the Chicago Public Library to organize the institution in the same city for which funds had been provided by the munificent bequest of Mr. Walter L. Newberry. This great institution, unlike most American libraries, is not a lending but a reference library, and is designed not for the reception of current literature, but for literature of historical interest. It hence contains many books for which it would be vain to seek in other American public libraries.

Under Dr. Poole's judicious management of the ample funds provided, assisted by liberal donations of books from the public, the library had accumulated, by the end of 1893, 117,000 bound volumes and 46,000 pamphlets, which have only just been removed from their temporary quarters to the magnificent edifice provided for them, in the interest of which the trustees, Messrs. Blatchford and Bradley, visited and studied the chief public libraries of Europe, and which, when the architectural plans are fully carried out, will be capable of accommodating four million volumes. A peculiar feature is the number of small rooms, designed to carry out theories of the librarian's own, the practical working of which will be observed with interest. A full description, with illustrations, appears in the Chicago Sunday Tribune of November 12th, 1893. Dr. Poole's sudden death is indeed a blow to the institution, and might have been irreparable if the initial difficulties of organization had not been fully overcome. He was before all things an organizer, and perhaps no librarian now living has done so much in this direction. But he was also a man of letters, and wrote several able papers on episodes of American history, including the chapter on witchcraft in the 'Memorial History of Boston.' On June 13th in last year he delivered before the North-Western University an address, marked by vigorous straightforward sense, on 'The University Library and the University Curriculum.' He was President of the American Historical Association, and had been President of the American Library Association from 1885 to 1887.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY SCHEME.

HOWEVER unfortunate the fact may appear to such as anticipated a practical outcome from the labours of the Gresham University Commission, it is only too clear that the report and recommendations, which are at length in the possession of the public, have failed to secure anything like a general assent. Except to the Commissioners themselves, and to those whom their conclusions happen to suit, we doubt whether this negative result will cause much dissatisfaction. Perhaps every one who values the higher education believes in the necessity of a teaching university in London, or would at any rate welcome such a university, established on a strong basis, under sound government and with ample resources. But the more emphatically one holds that a new university is to be desired, the more one would prefer to wait another three or five years, if need be, rather than jump at a scheme which did not commend itself to one's judgment.

It may or may not be true, as it has been rumoured, that some of the time consumed by the Commission was occupied by a gallant attempt on the part of a minority to secure the establishment of a wholly independent university, with plenary authority to determine its principles and methods, and power to comprehend any adequately equipped college which might be prepared to conform itself to those principles and methods. It is certainly true that, in an ill-advised mood, the Commissioners departed from the letter, if not from the essence, of their instructions, and, having been appointed to "consider, and, if you think fit, alter, amend, and extend" a particular charter remitted to them by the Queen, for the establishment of a teaching university, determined to lump together thirty or more miscellaneous institutions, differing widely in standing, aims, and efficiency; to suggest an oligarchic Council for the impossible task of (virtually) controlling all these heterogeneous bodies; to recommend a Statutory Commission in order to override objections; and to sketch out the heads of a Bill which would have to pass the two Houses of Parliament. If the Crown had contemplated such a formidable addition to the legislative baggage of the already perplexed Lords and Commons, it would scarcely have appointed commissioners to establish a teaching university under charter. It really seems as though Lord Cowper and his colleagues had raised a constitutional point of considerable gravity by departing so far from the terms of their reference.

The plan of the Commission, in its general aspects, may be briefly stated. It is to sum up, by simple addition, the existing University as an examining body, granting degrees as now without residence or attendance on prescribed lectures, and such institutions—all requiring attendance if not residence—as University College, King's College, nine metropolitan medical schools, the School of Medicine for Women, the Inns of Court, sundry colleges of music and theology, art and science, with any other institution which the Senate, or the Privy Council overruling the Senate, may decide to include, wholly or in part. There would be six faculties, each electing a dean; and their representatives—that is to say, representatives of teachers only—would constitute the Academic Council, presided over by a Vice-Chancellor nominated by the Senate. The Senate, consisting of sixty-five members, would include three nominated by the Crown, three by the President of the Council, one each by the Secretaries of State for India and the Colonies, nine by Convocation of the graduates, two by the London County Council, one each by the Royal Agricultural Society, the Institution of Civil Engineers, the Institute of British Architects, the Trustees of the British Museum, the Royal Society, the City and Guilds of London Institute, the City Corporation, and the Mercers' Company, and the remainder by the principal affiliated colleges and the faculties.

It is not surprising that this scheme appears to many persons not a little bizarre, and in its present shape it is not calculated to impress one with a conviction of its practicability. Is it capable of being modified into a practicable scheme? Can any one be sanguine that Parliament, even a year or two hence, will pass an Act on such a basis? Is it worth while to found a teaching university, whose degrees may be obtained by students whom it does not teach, and whom none of its colleges, schools, "institutes," "institutions," "inns," or "societies" teaches? It would not be fair to condemn too hastily a proposal which has been deliberately excogitated by men of high individual authority. But the wholesome discipline of criticism has already begun, and the more frank and frequent such criticism may be, the more hope there is of seeing one of these days a real university. It will be observed that the Commissioners make no direct provision for additional teaching, by professors or otherwise. They would simply say to the score or two of affiliated institutions, "Go on teaching as you have been accustomed to teach. Constitute the Academic Council out of your teaching bodies, and let that Council decide whether you teach well or not." It is true that the Statutory Commission would in the first instance decide what teachers should be "recognized" or not; but eventually the Council of fifteen, elected by teachers, would appoint the very teachers who in turn would elect the Council. The authorities of University College would have good reason to complain of the scanty recognition accorded to them by the Commissioners. University College provides what is practically a university education in every faculty except theology. In the course of 1893 it sent up to the existing University of London successful candidates for the degree of master or doctor in each faculty. It is recognized as an important centre of teaching and research, yet it would be represented on the new Senate by two members out of sixty-five.

These are only first impressions, but they appear to be sufficiently serious. Perhaps the most serious impression of all is the conviction that a teaching University for London cannot consistently begin by inviting all and sundry to come up and take its degrees by examination alone, without submitting themselves to its teaching.

SALES.

THE Toovey sale concluded at Messrs. Sotheby's rooms on Wednesday, the 7th inst. The following books are the more important ones disposed of in the last three days: Pontifical Romanum, MS. on vellum, fifteenth century, 22s. The Primer in Latin and English (after the use of Sarum), 1555, 38s. Nash, History of Worcestershire, 1781-2, 15s. Nichols, History of Leicestershire, large paper, 1795-1815, 155s. Ormerod, History of Chester, large paper, 1819, 20s. Picart, Cérémonies et Superstitions, large paper, 11 vols., 1723-43, 35s. 10s. Pol- whele, History of Devonshire, Exeter, 1793-1808, 15s. 10s. Strutt's Works, fine paper, 11 vols., 1775-1810, 49s. Purchas, Hakluytus Posthumus, 5 vols., 1625-6, 51s. Rapin's History of England, fine paper, 5 vols., 1732-47, 20s. 10s. Sir J. Reynolds, Engravings from his Works by S. W. Reynolds, 6 vols., 41s. Taylor, the Water Poet, Works, 1630, 19s. Turner, Picturesque Views of the Southern Coast, 24s. 15s. Shakespeare, Works, First Folio, wanting the title and verso, 1696. Notwithstanding the prejudice that sometimes is felt against booksellers' stocks, the prices throughout this sale have been remarkably well sustained, and in several cases Mr. Toovey's prices were considerably exceeded.

The sale of the second part of the library of the Comte de Lignerolles (see Athen. No. 3459) was continued last week. Amyot's translation of Plutarch's Lives and his Morals brought 6,500 fr.; the Œuvres Diverses of Balzac, in a binding adorned with the arms of Anne of Austria, 6,000 fr.; the Decameron, illustrated by Boucher, Eisen, &c., 6,980 fr.; the Contes des Fées of Perrault, with a portrait of Perrault engraved by Duflos after Tortobat, 4,950 fr.; and the Poésies of Madame de Mille. Deshoulières, with the arms of the Duke and Duchess de Lauraguais on the binding, 4,000 fr. The Beisiers of Dorat, the edition of 1770, fetched 2,560 fr.; but a copy almost identical reached only 900 fr. The City of Paris purchased for 1,100 fr. a copy of a poem of 1484 on "l'Entrée du roy nostre sire en la ville et cité de Paris."

THE LATE MR. CHILDS'S MANUSCRIPTS.

IN our obituary notice of Mr. Childs (Athenæum, No. 3459) we referred to his collection of manuscripts, and, in particular, to those in it from contemporary Englishmen and Americans. Among them were two stanzas by Hood written in a copy of his Comic Annual for 1842, the year in which Dickens paid his first visit to America. The book containing the verses was sold when Dickens's library was distributed, the late Mr. Welford securing it for Mr. Childs in competition with thirty-two English collectors. The lines are:—

Fehaw! Away with leaf and berry,
And the silver-sided cup!
Bring a goblet of bright sherry:
And a bumper fill me up.
Though I had a pledge to shiver,
And the longest ever was
Nay his vessel leaves the river,
I will drink a health to Bos!
Here's success to all his antics,
Since it pleases him to roam,
And to paddle o'er Atlantic,
After such a saiz at home!—
May he shun all rocks whatever,
And the shallow sand that lurks—
And his passage be as clever
As the best among his works!

THOS. HOOD.

The manuscript of 'Our Mutual Friend' was accounted by Childs one of his chief treasures. It formed two large quarto volumes, bound in brown morocco. The following letter from the author was inserted in the first volume:—

Gads Hill Place, Higham by Rochester, Kent,
Wednesday, Fourth November, 1868.

MY DEAR MR. CHILDS.—Welcome to England! Dolby will have told you that I am reading again—on a very fatiguing scale—but that after the end of next week, I shall be free for a fortnight as to country readings. On Monday next I shall be in town, and shall come straight to pay my respects to Mrs. Childs and you. In the mean time will you, if you can, so arrange your engagements as to give me a day or two here in the latter half of this month? My housekeeper-daughter is away hunting in Hampshire, but my sister-in-law is always in charge, and my married daughter would be charmed to come from London to receive Mrs. Childs. You cannot be quieter anywhere than here, and you certainly cannot have from any one a heartier welcome than from me. With kind regards to Mrs. Childs, Believe me, Faithfully Yours Always,
CHARLES DICKENS.

At the beginning of the first volume there is an outline of the story which covers sixteen pages. The following passages convey a good notion of the whole:—

OUR MUTUAL FRIEND, No. 1.

Chapter I.
On the Lookout.

The man in his boat, watching the tides. The Gaffer.—Gaffer.—
Gaffer Hexham Hexam.
His daughter rowing. Jenn, or Lizzie.
Taking the body in tow

His dissipated partner, has 'kibbled a live man!'
Riderhood—this fellow's name.

Chapter II.

The Man from Somersham.

The entirely new People.
Everything new. Grandfather new—if they had one.
Dinner party. Twemlow, Podsnap, Lady Toppins, Alfred Lighthouse, also Eugene—Mortimer, languid and tells of the Dust Contractor.

Then follow these headings:—

FOUR BOOKS.

- I. The Cup and the Lip.
- II. Birds of a Feather.
- III. A long Lane.
- IV. A Turning.

Sentences such as this appear on the margin: "Work in the girl who was to have been married and made rich."

Hawthorne contributed to the collection the manuscript of his 'Consular Experiences,' which cover thirty-seven pages; also a copy of the first edition of 'The Scarlet Letter' with the following letter:—

MY DEAR SIR,—Perhaps it may interest you to know that 'The Scarlet Letter' (your favourable opinion of which gratifies me much) is thus far founded on fact, that such a symbol was actually worn by at least one woman, in the early times of New England. Whether this person resembled Hester Prynne in any other circumstances of her character, I cannot say; nor whether this mode of ignominious punishment was brought from beyond the Atlantic, or originated with the New England Puritans. At any rate, the idea was so worthy of them that I am pliously inclined to allow them all the credit of it. Respectfully, NATHL. HAWTHORNE.

President Pierce, Hawthorne's schoolfellow and lifelong friend, was with him in his last hours, and wrote a letter to Mr. Fields, of Boston, describing the closing scene. This letter passed into the possession of Childs, and was included by him in his volume containing the portraits with autographs of every president of the United States. Mr. Pierce wrote:

Fenimewasset House, Thursday Morning, 6 o'clock
(19 May, 1864).

MY DEAR SIR,—The telegraph has communicated to you the fact of our dear friend Hawthorne's death. My friend, Col. Hibbard, who bears this note, was a friend of Hawthorne, and will tell you more than I am able to write. I enclose herewith a note, which I commenced last evening to dear Mrs. Hawthorne. Oh, how will she bear this shock! Dear Mother—dear children. When I met Hawthorne at Boston a week ago it was apparent that he was much more feeble, and more apparently diseased than I had supposed him to be. We came from Senter Harbour yesterday afternoon, and I thought he was on the whole brighter than he was the day before. Through the week he has been inclined to somnolency during the day, but restless at night. He retired last night soon after nine o'clock, and soon fell into a quiet slumber. In less than half an hour changed his position, but continued to sleep. I left the door open between his bed and mine, our beds being opposite to each other, and was asleep myself before 11 o'clock. The light continued to burn in my room. At 2 o'clock I went to H.'s bedside; he was apparently in a sound sleep, and I did not place my hand upon him. At 4 o'clock I went into his room again, and as his position was unchanged, I placed my hand upon him and found that life was extinct. I sent, however, immediately for a physician and called Judge Bell and Colo. Hibbard, who occupied rooms upon the same floor and near me. He lies upon his side—his position so perfectly natural and easy—his eyes closed—that it is difficult to realize while looking upon his noble face that this is death. He must have passed from natural slumber to that from which there is no waking within the slightest moment.

I cannot write to dear Mrs. Hawthorne, and you must exercise your judgment with regard to sending this and the unfinished note enclosed to her.

Y^r Friend,

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

Among the manuscripts there is the original of William Godwin's 'Cloudestley: a Novel.' It is written in a clear hand on both sides of sheets of parchment. Far more curious is Harriet Martineau's 'Retrospect of Western Travel,' in her bold handwriting, bound in four volumes, with portraits inserted which were taken in 1833 and 1850. The variety of the manuscripts is as great as their value. If a choice had to be made, it would be difficult to select what would have the greatest interest for the greatest number. Should those which have been quoted not seem attractive enough, we may add that the collection contains a letter from Coleridge expressing his readiness to go to London if he could be assured of receiving a guinea a week; the manuscript of Schiller's 'Demetrius' and the original draft of Tennyson's dedicatory poem to the Queen; a letter from Nelson written four days before his death; and many letters from Charles Lamb.

Literary Gossip.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish early in April a new novel by Mr. E. F. Benson. Like 'Dodo,' it is a story of society.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has decided to issue a library parallel with the "Pseudonym" series, in which the contributors will not disguise their names. The title of this new series will be "The Autonym Library." In size and price it will be similar to its contemporary; but the cover and get-up will be different, and the edges will be cut. The publisher thinks that a certain number of the authors whom he would like to have included in the "Pseudonym Library" object to sinking their real names. The first volume of "The Autonym Library," which will be issued after Easter, is by Mr. F. Marion Crawford.

MR. AITKEN's edition of 'Parnell's Poems' will be issued soon after Easter in Messrs. Bell's series of "Aldine Poets." The introductory memoir is to contain fresh biographical matter, and in the notes the manner in which Pope amended his friend's verses when preparing them for the press will be pointed out.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish immediately new editions of three volumes of Mr. George Meredith's poems which have been for some little time out of print. They are 'Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life,' 'Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth,' and 'Modern Love.'

MESSRS. HARRISON & SONS will shortly issue by subscription the 'Inventories of Christchurch, Canterbury,' with illustrative documents, ranging from 1294 to 1780, edited by Dr. Wickham Legg and Mr. W. H. St. John Hope. The inventories will include the important one of 1315, from a new transcript of the original in Cott. MS. Galba E. IV., rectifying the numerous errors and omissions of Dart; the hitherto unpublished inventories taken at the suppression in 1540 and at the metropolitan visitation of Archbishop Parker in 1563; and a number of minor documents of very great interest. A copious glossary and index will be added. The work is already in the press, and will be issued during the present year.

THE death took place on Monday of General Sir George Balfour, who for some years, in Parliament and out of Parliament, had taken an active interest in promoting the study of the Russian, Turkish, and other languages among the officers of the army and navy, for which he obtained valuable co-operation from the Government.

THE Council of the Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language reports a large increase in the number of those who passed in Irish last year at the Intermediate Examinations. The passes rose to 379 from 176 in 1892. The number of those who passed in the National Schools also increased. The sale of the publications of the Society, too, was greater than in the preceding year. The financial situation of the Society is satisfactory.

MR. F. F. ROGET, Lecturer on French Literature and on Romance Philology in the University of St. Andrews, has undertaken to edit for Messrs. Williams & Norgate a "Homme de Lettres" series of French classics with prefaces. The first volume, now in preparation with the help of Dr. Seele, of Leipzig, consists of Voltaire's 'Contes en Prose.' The 'Lettres sur les Anglais,' parts of the works of Rabelais and Montaigne, the 'Thoughts' of Pascal, &c., are to follow.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE will contribute to the April number of the New Review 'A Note on Walt Whitman,' in which he introduces an account of his visit to Walt Whitman in America.

MR. FREDERICK MACMILLAN will preside at the annual dinner of the London Association of Correctors of the Press, which is to take place on Saturday, the 21st of April.

THE Goethe-Jahrbuch for 1894, which is to be published shortly, will contain among other matter an account, by Dr. Suphan, of 'Napoleon's Unterhaltungen mit Goethe und Wieland und F. von Müller's Memoire darüber für Talleyrand.' This contribution is expected to throw some light on the erroneous report of Goethe's interview with Napoleon published some years ago in Talleyrand's 'Mémoires.' Dr. L. Geiger, the editor of the Jahrbuch, will contribute, among a number of other papers, an article entitled 'Grillparzer über Goethe.' Dr. Alexander Tille will furnish a contribution on the odd 'Hexeneinmaleins' and the verses of the animals in the 'Hexenküche.'

THE American Folk-lore Society has issued the first instalment of its "Memoirs," 'Folk-Tales of Angola,' by Heli Chatelain, who was formerly U.S. Commercial Agent in Loanda. The work gives in original text and literal translation the oral literature of the West African coast. The series is intended to include collections of the French Creole tales from Louisiana, and of the superstitions still to be found among the English-speaking population of the United States. Mr. Nutt is the Society's London agent.

WE regret to report another loss to Hebrew learning and the Jewish pulpit by the death of Dr. Joseph Perles, rabbi at Munich, which occurred on the 7th inst., at the age of sixty. Dr. Perles has chiefly contributed essays on Talmudic philology, besides others on Jewish history and burial rites according to the Talmud.

THE death of Sir James Stephen is a distinct loss; but probably he would have made a greater figure in literature had he not been for so many years active as a journalist. It is not with impunity that a man, even of Sir James Stephen's ability, devotes his best energies for some dozen years or so to the daily and weekly press. His most ambitious contribution to letters was his volume on 'Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality,' a masculine and vigorous piece of writing, if a trifle too polemical. 'The Story of Nuncomar' was a masterly effort, which killed the Macaulay version of Hastings's career once and for ever. This admirable piece of historical criticism we owe to its writer's sojourn in India, which inspired him with an interest in the history of British rule there. In such a work he was more at home than in a comparatively abstract theme like that of the treatise before mentioned. Of more limited interest, but a wonderful piece of work for a busy judge to achieve, was his 'History of the Criminal Law of England,' in which he returned to the theme he had illustrated in one of his first books, 'A General View of the Criminal Law of England.' Sir James had of late collected some of the best of his remarkable contributions to the Saturday Review, and issued them under the title of 'Hore Sabbathica.'

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week include the Twelfth Report of the Royal University of Ireland (2d.); the Report for the University of Edinburgh (2d.); and Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877 (Oxford), Statutes (1d.).

SCIENCE

The Out-Door World; or, Young Collector's Handbook. By W. Furneaux, F.R.G.S. (Longmans & Co.)

THE title of this volume does not furnish much information respecting its scope. Turning, however, to the table of contents, we find that Mr. Furneaux has made the praiseworthy but bold attempt to condense into an octavo volume of four hundred pages a brief account of the British fauna and flora, and a still briefer one of the minerals and fossils. But since the last section is disposed of in seven pages, unrelieved by figures of any of the commonest fossils, and containing no facts concerning the nature of, and mode of identifying, even a few of the commonest stones, the reason for its inclusion in this volume is not particularly obvious.

The second part, dealing with the vegetable world, occupies seventy pages. It is divided into seven chapters, which treat respectively of seaweeds, fungi, mosses, ferns, wild-flowers, grasses, and forest trees. Illustrations are scattered copiously through these chapters, and happily they are sufficiently well drawn and reproduced to enable a collector to identify several of the plants that are of common occurrence; the text at the same time will furnish him with an elementary knowledge of the classification of the vegetable kingdom, and will also familiarize him with the use of many botanical terms. But it is clear that no satisfactory results could be expected from the compression of so vast a subject into so small a compass.

The rest of the book—i.e. the remaining 320 pages or thereabouts—is devoted to British animals, and is deserving of rather more than the passing notice that has been accorded to the other two parts. It is split up into the following eight chapters: 1. Ponds and Streams; 2. Insects and Insect Hunting; 3. The Sea-Shore; 4. Snails and Slugs; 5. Spiders, Centipedes, and Millipedes; 6. Reptiles and Reptile Hunting; 7. British Birds; 8. British Mammals. Although it is open to question whether this treatment of the British fauna is the best that could be chosen, yet if it had been logically carried out there would have been no occasion for fault-finding. But indications of a certain lack of method about the work suggest the idea that Mr. Furneaux started with the intention of dealing with his subject in the manner adopted by the Rev. J. G. Wood in his 'Common Objects of the Country,' 'Common Objects of the Sea-Shore,' &c., and that he subsequently changed his plan and proceeded to discuss the animals, not according to habitat, but according to structural affinity. For in the chapter upon "Ponds and Streams," although the reader will find notes upon the water-spider (called for some unknown reason the argonaut), the water-beetles, gnats, dragon-flies, newts, frogs, and toads, yet for information respecting the water-vole and water-shrew he must refer to the chapter upon the Mammalia. Moreover, in the chapter upon the sea-shore no mention is made of any of our common sea-birds.

It is impossible to pass the chapter upon insects without protesting against the undue prominence that has been accorded to the butterflies and large moths. These insects have already been collected over and over again; and over and over again have they been figured and described. Yet Mr. Furneaux has treated them as if they were the most important of all the Hexapoda. There is no doubt that the value of his book would have been greatly enhanced if he had seized the opportunity of trying to rouse the interest of schoolboys in an order like the Orthoptera, which, although second to none in importance, has hitherto been almost wholly neglected. As a matter of fact this prominent and often obtrusive element of our fauna has been entirely omitted by the author.

So, too, with the Mammalia. We have, unfortunately, only a few species of this group in our country; and if Mr. Furneaux had taken the trouble to compile a list of them with a few diagnostic characters of each, and if, by pointing out that information respecting distribution and variation with sex, age, and environment, is much needed, he had encouraged boys to collect them, he would have conferred a real benefit upon science. The truth of the matter appears to be that in his schoolboy days Mr. Furneaux was a naturalist of the butterfly, beetle, and bird's-egg type, with but little acquaintance with nature outside these subjects; and that in writing this book he has had neither the knowledge nor the wish to help his youthful successors out of the groove along which he and so many others have travelled.

But judging of the volume as it is, and not as what it might have been, we are glad to be able to say in its praise that the information it contains is clearly and interestingly put, and is for the most part accurate. We wish to draw special attention to a useful table containing brief information respecting the migratory habits, the materials and situation of the nests, and the appearance and number of the eggs of over 130 of our common birds. Moreover, to each section Mr. Furneaux has added instructions concerning collecting, labelling, preserving, skinning, &c., which will be most helpful to beginners.

Now for a last word about the figures. The prominence that is given to this part of the book is praiseworthy, and may be judged of by the fact that the 319 pages of text devoted to the British fauna contain about 550 figures. Some of these representing insects and shells, which are easy to draw, are fairly good, but those of the birds and mammals are for the most part execrable. The harvest-mouse, for instance, possesses a head like an otter's; the otter's tail is relatively shorter than a cat's; the shrew is provided with a highly developed external ear and a large intelligent eye; and the porpoise is represented as floating buoyantly upon the surface of the sea, as if inflated with gas. And turning to the Invertebrata, the reader will find that the hermit-crab has been copied from a dried museum specimen, which had the abdomen shrivelled up like a piece of parchment, and that the artist who drew the species of centipede which never has more, and, when adult, never fewer than 15 pairs of legs, has put 16 of these appendages on one side, and 17 on the other. But for these faults it is probable that the publishers are more to blame than the author. Publishers as a class, when issuing a work of this kind, seem to think that any figure is better than none, and are apt to load their pages with illustrations badly drawn, and printed from blocks which are none the better for wear. Mr. Furneaux's publishers, however, cannot be made answerable for the fact that for the figure of a water-flea—an animal which he rightly states to be a crustacean—is substituted a representation of the larval form of a Hydrachna, the adult stage of which is figured two pages further on as an example of an arachnid water-mite!

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE 'Evolution of India,' by Mr. R. D. Oldham, the distinguished Indian geologist, is the leading paper in this month's Geographical Journal. The author distinguishes three great epochs in the geographical history of India. During the first of these epochs there rose into existence only the Aravalli range and the east coast of the peninsula; then succeeded a long era of quiescence during which the great river-systems were evolved; and lastly there followed another period of great earth movements, ushered in by volcanic eruptions on a gigantic scale. It was during this third epoch that the Himalaya and the Tibetan plateau were upheaved. During the second of these epochs there existed a connexion between India and South Africa, as is proved by the close relationship between the fossil floras and faunas of the two countries. Another paper in the same Journal gives an account of a journey into Hadramaut, by Dr. L. Hirsch, who succeeded last year in reaching Terim, a town about 150 miles from the coast, and never before visited by a European.

Two expeditions will probably start for the North Pole by the north-east in the ensuing season, led by Mr. Jackson and by Mr. Wellman, an American journalist. Mr. Jackson, whose expenses will be borne by a generous friend, proposes to take Francis Joseph Land for his base of operation, whilst Mr. Wellman intends to make a "dash" for the Pole from the north coast of Spitzbergen, and actually hopes to reach it in a single summer! Mr. Wellman will be accompanied by Prof. Frenon, late of the American Coast Survey.

M. de Brettes, who is still engaged in an exploration of Colombia in South America, communicates interesting information on the Arhuacas-Kogabas Indians, with whom he spent a couple of months at the close of last year. These Indians are an amiable people, who live in a most fertile country at the foot of the Sierra Nevada. They are dying out rapidly, because they will take baths at all hours of the day, and dry themselves by a blazing fire, instead of making use of a towel. This custom, it is supposed by M. de Brettes, accounts for bronchitis, rheumatic affections, and other diseases, which carry off the young and the very aged. He saw but one man who appeared to be over sixty.

The twenty-eighth part of the new edition of W. & A. K. Johnston's Royal Atlas contains maps of the world, of the Arctic regions, and Africa, together with the title and contents of the whole work, which is now complete.

The fourth part of the Historical Atlas published by Messrs. Hachette contains maps of Italy in the time of the Republic, of the Carolingian empire, and of Turkey and Poland in the eighteenth century. There are only three plates, but these contain ten maps, in addition to which there are nine plans and diagrams inserted in the explanatory notes which are printed on the back of each plate.

The Mémoires of the Belgian Academy publish the astronomical and magnetical observations made on an expedition up the Congo by the late Major Delporte, assisted by Capt. Gillis. The results of this expedition are of very great importance, for they enable us for the first time to lay down the course of the Congo from its mouth up to Stanley Falls. The positions of thirty-five points were determined by astronomical observations. Stanley Falls station is placed in lat. 6° 30' 18" N., long. 25° 10' 43", at an elevation of 1,400 feet above the level of the sea. The magnetic variation decreased from 16° 40' 20" at the mouth of the river to 10° 4' 15" at the Falls; the dip was 25° 12' at the mouth of the river, 13° 14' at Umangi, and 17° 6' at the Falls.

Mr. J. P. Thomson publishes an article on 'The Land of Viti,' or Fiji, in the Scottish Geographical Magazine, which abounds in useful and trustworthy information, largely derived from personal observation. Mr. Thomson most properly credits Tasman with the discovery of this important Pacific island group, but he surely is extremely rash when he writes: "There is little doubt that in much earlier times this archipelago was not unknown to the Phœnician sailors who voyaged across the Indian and South Pacific Oceans to the shores of the great American continent."

Dr. Elyseef, who was reported to have been captured by the Mahdists, is safe back at St. Petersburg, and is preparing an account of his adventures.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 8.—Sir J. Lubbock, Bart., V.P., in the chair.—The Croonian Lecture, 'La fine Structure des Centres nerveux,' was delivered by Prof. S. Ramón y Cajal, of Madrid.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—March 12.—Hon. G. C. Brodric, V.P., in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Sir C. Hunter, Bart., Lieut. H. H. P. Deasy, Very Rev. A. J. Maclean, Rev. C. Harris, Messrs. C. H. Cowling, R. McAulan, and J. A. Frenon.—The paper read was 'Montenegro and its Border Lands,' by Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 8.—Mr. G. Leveson-Gower, V.P., and afterwards Mr. C. H. Read, Secretary, in the chair.—Mr. Leach exhibited and described the deed of foundation of a chantry at Beverley in 1352, with seal of the Corpus Christi guild appended.—The President exhibited two candlesticks of fourteenth century Limoges enamel, constructed apparently out of the bases of two ciboria or monstrances.—Chancellor Ferguson, Local Secretary for Cumberland, reported the discovery of two Roman inscriptions at Carlisle, on which Mr. Haverfield communicated some remarks.—Mr. Payne exhibited a fine series of Anglo-Saxon antiquities in gold, bronze, beads, glass, &c., from the famous cemetery called the King's Field, at Faversham.—Dr. Weber communicated a paper on Indian eyeglasses, which he showed were at one time used for currency under the name of cats' eyes.

GEOLOGICAL.—March 7.—Dr. H. Woodward, President, in the chair.—Messrs. J. W. Bradley, J. A. Foote, T. E. Knightley, and L. J. Spencer were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'The Systematic Position of the Trilobites,' by Mr. H. M. Bernard, communicated by Dr. H. Woodward; 'Landscape Marble,' by Mr. H. Thompson; and 'On the Discovery of Molluscs in the Upper Keuper at Shrewley, in Warwickshire,' by the Rev. P. B. Brodie.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—March 7.—Mr. A. Wyon in the chair.—Mr. Earle Way described some remarkable finds which have recently been made at Southwark, near the site of the old Marshalsea Prison. On a former occasion the discovery of a great many piles on what was once marshy ground had been reported. More recently, a great many flint implements of the neolithic period have been found, with evidences of manufacture on the spot, these being in a thin bed of sand below the later accumulated soil.—Mr. Loftus Brock spoke of the evidences brought to light, at various times in past years, of the discovery of pikes, as if associated with lake dwellings, in various parts of Southwark.—Mr. de Gray Birch exhibited a squeeze from a Roman altar at Schloss Fürstenu, Hesse Darmstadt, dedicated to Diana by Vitellius.—The Rev. J. Cave Browne exhibited a silver Royalist badge, cast and partially engraved, which had been preserved by his family for several generations.—A paper was read by the Chairman on sundry additions to what is known relative to some of the Great Seals of England, and photographs of several examples were exhibited. It was shown that although Edward III. renounced for a time the title of King of France, nevertheless the fleurs de lys of France still appeared on the Great Seal. By inspection of a deed in the Augmentation Office, the engraving of Queen Elizabeth's second seal, used in 1587, is proved to be the work of Nic Hiliard, and he was granted a lease of certain property for twenty-one years in consideration of his having engraved it. Some curious particulars were rendered with respect to the want of a Great Seal by Parliament during the Civil War, when the Great Seal of England was with the king. Charles II. when in considerable monetary difficulties, ordered the making of seals, and some unpublished documents were referred to. The existence of a hitherto unknown fourth seal of Charles II. was proved, there being minute roses in the field. It is used in and after 1673, but there seems to be no existing record why the previous seal was discarded for the insertion of roses.—A second paper on Kepton Church could not be read, owing to the lateness of the hour.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—March 7.—Chancellor Ferguson in the chair.—Mr. E. Green exhibited and described a bailliff's mace from Marshfield, Gloucestershire. The mace is about 2 ft. 6 in. in length, and of copper gilt, having the arms of Charles I. on the head, and those of the lord of the manor at the base. The arches over the head are probably a later addition.—Mr. C. J. Davies read a monograph on the subject of what is traditionally regarded as the heart of King Henry II. of England. This relic was removed from the great abbey of Fontevault shortly after its secularization, and deposited in the museum at Orleans. In 1857 it was handed over by the municipality to Bishop Gillies, the vicar apostolic of the eastern district of Scotland, for presentation to the English Government. Lord Palmerston, the then Prime Minister, having declined to accept the heart, it was entrusted to the care of St. Margaret's Convent, Edinburgh, where it still remains. Mr. Davies, in the course of his paper, quoted a theory that the organ in question had not formed part of Henry II.'s but of Henry III.'s body, and proceeded to adduce several arguments against this view.—Mr. W. H. St. John Hope communicated some notes on the Castle of the Peak, Derbyshire.

ZOOLOGICAL.—March 6.—Dr. A. Günther, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during February.—Mr. W. Bateson exhibited and made remarks on a series of pichards, the scales of which presented some remarkable variations. Mr. Bateson also gave an account of an abnormally coloured brill.—Dr. J. W. Gregory gave an account of the factors that appear to have influenced zoological distribution in East Africa, and made some suggestions as to how the present anomalies of animal life in that part of the continent might be accounted for. Dr. Gregory also exhibited and made remarks on a series of lantern-slides illustrative of his recent journey to Mount Kenya.—Communications were read: from Prof. F. Jeffrey Bell, on examples of three species of river-crab of the genus Thelphusa from different districts of East Africa;—by Mr. W. H. Adams, on the habits of the flying squirrels of the Gold Coast belonging to the genus Anomalurus;—by Mr. W. Bateson, on two cases of colour-variation in flat-fishes, illustrative of the principles of symmetry;—from Prof. P. B. Uhler, of Vienna, on the Hemiptera Heteroptera of Grenada, West Indies, based on specimens submitted to his examination by the committee for the exploration of the West Indies;—and from Mr. W. Schaas, on a large number of new species of moths from Tropical America.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—March 13.—Mr. A. Giles, President, in the chair.—A paper was read dealing with 'The Prevention and Detection of Waste of Water,' by Mr. E. Collins.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—March 8.—The Hon. H. Chaplin in the chair.—A paper 'On the Indian Currency' was read before the Indian Section by Mr. J. B. Robertson.—An important discussion followed, and was adjourned till the 13th inst.

March 12.—Mr. H. Stannus delivered the fourth and concluding lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On the Decorative Treatment of Traditional Foliage.'

March 13.—The adjourned discussion on Mr. J. B. Robertson's paper 'On the Indian Currency' was resumed and concluded.

March 14.—Mr. F. Cobb in the chair.—A paper 'On the Fountain Air Brush' was read by Mr. C. L. Burdich.—The instrument itself was shown in action.

MATHEMATICAL.—March 8.—Mr. A. B. Kempe, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. Brand was elected a Member.—Mr. P. W. Hill and Major Hippiley were admitted into the Society.—The following communications were made: 'Groups of Points on Curves,' by Mr. F. S. Macaulay; 'On a Simple Contrivance for compounding Elliptic Motions,' and 'On the Buckling and Wrinkling of Plating supported on a Framework under the Influence of Oblique Stresses,' by Mr. G. H. Bryan; 'On the Motion of Paired Vortices with a Common Axis,' by Mr. A. E. H. Love; and 'On the Existence of a Root of a Rational Integral Equation,' by Prof. Elliott.

PHYSICAL.—March 9.—Prof. A. W. Rüchker, President, in the chair.—Prof. O. Henriel made a communication 'On Mathematical Calculating Machines, especially a New Harmonic Analyzer.'—Mr. H. Wilde exhibited and described his "Magnetarium."

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Victoria Institute 4½.—A Possible Cause for the Origin of the Tradition of the Flood. Prof. J. Freestrich.
- Tues. Artist-club, 8.—Symposium 'The Relation of Language to Thought,' Miss E. E. C. Jones, Mr. J. S. Mason, and Mr. O. F. Stovel.
- Wed. Bibliographical, 8.—The Bibliography of Chaucer, Mr. R. B. Whimley.
- Thurs. Society of Arts, 8½.—Indian Railway Extension: its Relation to the Trade of India and of the United Kingdom, Mr. J. Watson.
- Fri. Statistical, 7½.—Statistics of Pauperism in Old Age, Mr. C. Booth.
- Sat. Civil Engineers, 8.—Discussion on Mr. Collins's Paper 'On the Prevention and Detection of Waste of Water.'
- Zoological, 8½.—Myology of the Actinomorphic and Hystero-morphous Rodentia, Mr. F. G. Parsons; 'Notes on Cynopoma jennisi,' Puhai Iam Iruma Kinyai; 'Ontogeny of certain Cranes, Bats, and their Allies, with Remarks upon their Affinities,' Dr. R. W. Kheifetz.
- Wen. Geological, 8.—Origin of certain Novanulites and Quartzites, Mr. Y. Hatley; 'Occurrence of Perlitic Cracks in Quartz,' Mr. W. W. Watts.
- Folk-lore, 8.—The Problems of Diffusion: Replies to Recent Criticisms, Mr. J. Jacobs; 'Polish and Serbian Demonology as Exemplified in their Folk-Tales,' Mr. J. T. Naisk; 'Report of the Ethnographical Committee.'
- Microscopical, 8½.—Notes on the Uroplatan, Mr. A. D. Michael.
- Meteorological, 8.—Relation between the Mean Quarterly Temperature and the Depth, Date, and Duration and Latent Extent of Gales of Wind, and the Measurement of their Intensity, Mr. W. H. Innes; 'Effect on the Readings of the Dry Bulb of the Close Proximity of the Reservoir of the Wet Bulb Thermometer,' Mr. J. Gooder; 'Calculation of Barographic Cloud Measurements,' Dr. K. G. Olsson; 'Sudden Changes of the Barometer in the Highlands on February 22nd, 1894,' Mr. R. H. Scott.
- Obituary, 8½.—Anniversary, President's Address.
- British Archaeological Association, 8½.—Origin of Parish Church Building, Mr. R. Lloyd; 'Discoveries at Kepton Church, Derbyshire,' Mr. J. T. Irvine.

Scientific Gossip.

Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co. will shortly publish a new book by Mr. J. W. Tutt, under the title of 'Woodside, Burnside, Hillside, and Marsh.' This will consist of a series of illustrated essays on somewhat similar lines to the author's 'Random Recollections of Woodland, Fen, and Hill,' and will describe a series of natural history rambles in various parts of Kent and the Scotch Highlands, dealing with the natural objects and phenomena observed (geological, ornithological, entomological, botanical, and geographical) in a popular way.

THREE more small planets have been discovered: two by Dr. Max Wolf at Heidelberg on the 1st inst., and another by M. Courty at Bordeaux on the 5th, raising the whole number known (unless some of the recent announcements turn out to be identical with previous discoveries) to 389.

FINE ARTS

Renaissance Architecture and Ornaments in Spain. Measured and drawn by Andrew N. Prentice. (Batsford.)

MR. PRENTICE has travelled across Spain, beginning at Santiago, and ending in the island of Majorca, drawing such buildings and parts of them as attracted his attention on the way, and he has now printed the contents of his portfolio with just enough letterpress to explain the plates. His object has been to represent what he saw, and he sets it before us in the order of his journey, without any attempt at arrangement or classification. The book is an architect's sketch-book, and nothing more; but, judging it as that, it is amongst the best that have come before us lately.

Spain is one of the most interesting countries in Europe to the architectural student, but from various causes it has been one of the least studied. Besides being the meeting-place of Eastern and Western culture in the Middle Ages, it was the only Southern land in which Gothic architecture found a home and flourished. When the so-called architecture of Italy was merely the overlaying with ornament of formless building, that of Spain was as truly organic as the best in England or France, and some of the Spanish buildings of the latest time rank amongst the finest Gothic works in the world.

With these things Mr. Prentice has nothing to do. He selects his examples from Renaissance works only, and his date-limits are the years 1500-1560. But those Renaissance designs are what they are because when they were made the old tradition and the instinct for real design in building still lived, as they did in every country which had an architecture of its own. And just so long as they survived did the Renaissance produce work of value. They were slowly stifled by the pedantry of the dilettanti, and the dull monotony of the five orders was imposed upon the world.

Spanish architecture was still alive at the time which Mr. Prentice chooses to illustrate, and some of it was decidedly good, but more was spoiled by fantastic extravagance. The architects followed the fashion of the day in using the revived classic detail, but they used it quite in their own way, and the work is thoroughly national. One of the best things in the book is the library at Santiago, which comes first; and some of the arcaded courtyards so characteristic of Spanish domestic architecture are excellent in their way.

Of ecclesiastical work Mr. Prentice does not give much, except the great iron screens which are peculiar to the churches of the Peninsula and a few on the north side of the Pyrenees. He draws several of these, but the scale is usually too small for justice to be done to them.

Mr. Prentice's work is generally good. The sketches are sometimes slight, but they are bright and telling; and the measured drawings are clear, although economy of labour is perhaps carried to an extreme in them. Some plates suffer from over-reduction by the photolithographer. And it is a pity that care was not taken that the reduction should be in each case to some recognized scale. Now it is impossible to measure anything on a plate except by applying a pair of dividers to the printed scale at the bottom. A very little more trouble would have been needed to make each some proportional part of a foot, and the plates themselves would not have been the worse for it.

When we look at a new book of this sort our pleasure in it is marred by the thought of the evil use to which it will be put. There are architects, especially amongst those who trade in competitions, who are always on the look-out for such works, and who want them, not for intelligent study that they may learn how the old artists worked under the conditions in which they were, but simply as copybooks. The various changes of fashion amongst the poorer sort of architectural designers may be clearly traced to the publication of various books, beginning with those of Stuart and the Adams a hundred years ago. Now we look to see Mr. Prentice's "patios" travestied into shop fronts. Some of the designs would lend themselves easily to translation into cast iron.

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

As usual, this society has unwisely encumbered its walls with more than seven hundred drawings, of which not more than one hundred are worthy of notice. And yet there is a very marked improvement in the technique of the contributions, and their defects are obviously due less to want of skill and care than to lack of invention and purpose on the part of the painters, the greater number of whom must have intended to do their best when they set to work, but were not in the possession of any ideas when they started. The amount of time and pains expended on the ineptitudes before us has been so extraordinary that a critic dreads to think of it, and prefers to dwell on the drawings which deserve criticism. There are, in fact, about twenty really excellent pictures, of which none is markedly superior to the others, and which we may notice as we come to them in their order on the walls, putting each artist's works together, and beginning with Mr. E. Bundy's Guardon of Polly (No. 16), a spirited design, bold and powerful, yet marred by not a little that is unrefined in taste, style, and colour. Though not graceful, Mr. Bundy's draughtsmanship is skilful, and the virility of his picture is noteworthy, if not encouraging as to his future. The two other drawings he exhibits, They're Late (331) and The News (400), are of less account, yet still worthy of notice. No. 400 is the better.—Mr. A. F. Grace's High Street, Steyning (93), excels in force, harmony, and veracity.—Of figure pictures proper Mr. O. S. Knowles's The Ghost Story (114), a fireside scene of two girls listening in dread to a legend told by an old lady whose manner appals them, is perhaps the most original and cleverly designed and ably painted, while the effect of quivering firelight and starting shadows in the room they occupy is almost as good as the nervous terror of the younger maiden, who clings to her sister's arm.—Mr. J. Fulleylove is at his best in The Piazza, Venice (207), thoroughly well drawn and solid, a small, luminous, and silvery piece, a study of the effect of daylight upon the massive and beautiful architecture. Another view of the same place, No. 163, is only less acceptable, while King's College Chapel, Cambridge (321), deserves to be reckoned among the best works of this admirable painter of architecture. We care less for his Trafalgar Square (484) than for his Lion Column and Campanile, Venice (648), which is limpid and rich in colour.—Mr. H. Gandy sends A Cuprice (220), a highly accomplished drawing, which gives promise of better and more ambitious work.

The Moon just peeps above the Brow (245) is the best contribution of Mr. J. Aumonier, who this year has usually dealt with the effect of glowing moonlight falling upon arable hill-sides and newly reaped meadows. Of this picture, even more than of its neighbour Moonrise (106), and the charming Rising Moon (262), a first-rate and harmonious study of nature similar to No. 245, we have nothing but praise to offer. To the same class belong The Afterglow (342), Evening, near Wareham (401), and Folding Time (650). The last is especially harmonious and sincerely sympathetic as a study from nature of a sunny down and sheep skilfully grouped.—In Katherine (205) Sir J. D. Lenton displays characteristic skill, solid draughtsmanship, and sound drawing of the face and figure. His Autumn (314) represents a comely lady in a pale-coloured satin dress, the open front of which reveals her sumptuous bust, thus giving an opportunity for contrasting her carnations and the deep tint of her robe. The drawing of the features is thoroughly learned, sound, and appropriate, but the expression so lacks purpose and energy that the subject of the picture is not manifest. The painting of the flesh without shadows is a noteworthy piece of art. We care less for the painter's Rest (370), although we like it.—In quite another manner than that of the President of the Institute, Mr. W. H. Weatherhead has depicted a young matron ensconced in a window seat and diligently mending a child's garment. He calls it Mother's Work (287), and deserves praise for a modest, simple, and artistic production.

If compelled to name the most charming piece of colour, light, and tone in this exhibition, we should, without hesitation, pick out Miss M. L. Gow's delightful Corner of a Studio (271), a thoroughly well-finished and delicate study of bric-a-brac, splendid fabrics, and metals.—In Things of Rare Grace and Classic Age Around (294) Mr. F. Spencer has painted a group of old books and a statuette of bronze with exceptional skill and patience. He has made a good picture out of simple materials, touching them with singular dexterity and care. As a whole the colour is praiseworthy, but a more brilliant object or two would add to the attractions of the work.—An Old-Fashioned Christmas Dinner (377) has given Mr. O. Green opportunities for depicting the elderly beaux and belles, the comely maidens and youths of the later days of George III. Wilkie or Jan Steen would have made the not very lively subject of the cook bringing in the plum pudding to a Christmas party interesting and fresh; but Mr. Green has failed to do so, the expressions of his diners, though correct enough, being commonplace, and their attitudes ordinary if not tame. On the other hand, he has delineated the furniture of the room, dresses, and table equipage with exemplary care and dexterity which is decidedly pleasing. The whole, though "cut up," is flat and thinly painted.—Like all Mr. Hine's many pictures of the chalk hills and valleys of Sussex and Dorsetshire, Nine-Barrow Down (395), a beautiful drawing, illustrates his sense of the grandeur of the subject, and his feeling for its colour, massiveness, and simplicity. Bible Bottom on the Malling Hills

(10), a study of that fine subject, the opposed sides of smooth and verdant hills, is, though slight, extremely tender. Seven Sisters (20) exhibits the skill and poetic feeling of the artist when employed upon a calm sea covered with mist, the golden-coloured shore, and the sevenfold peaks of a lofty chalk cliff in Sussex. The colour and atmosphere are charming, true, and delicate. These are the most important of six admirable drawings of varied subjects and scenes.

Sylvia (397), by Mr. H. Ryland, deserves for its technical freshness and spirit to be grouped with Miss Gow's delightful study. Very pretty and dainty indeed is Mr. Ryland's Sea Music (286), a girl listening to the murmur of a shell. Its light and colour are decidedly pleasing, and the touch is broad, sound, and crisp.—One of the largest and most ambitious pictures here is Mr. W. Langley's After the Storm (587), which depicts a group of fisher folk gathered, at the foot of some steps leading to the shore, round a sailor's corpse, which has been brought ashore and lies upon the shingle. The bare, sodden feet, blanched by the sea, are conspicuous. The story is well and very powerfully told, the design excellent; the composition, although rather scattered, is not more so than the varied emotions and incidents require, while the choice and development of them are highly creditable to the artist, who has not till now produced anything nearly so good as this profoundly pathetic work. On the other hand, some of the figure drawing in the foreground is bad, and the shadows on the boats behind the figures, being sooty, bespeak the lamp.—At any rate, this grim tragedy forms a contrast to Mr. Kilburne's rather mild comedy which he calls Miss Pinkerton's Academy (606), a number of plump and short-waisted girls, in the costume of our grandmothers, issuing from the mansion at Chiswick where Becky Sharp was a thorn in the side of the principal. We fail to identify Becky among the dull and demure damsels to whom Mr. Kilburne has given neither animation nor beauty, nor does their elderly mistress remind us of Dr. Johnson's admirer. The design is, in short, tame, and, though some of the damsels are pleasing, none of them is pretty. Besides, the work is somewhat flat, and wants force and colour. Still, apart from these shortcomings, the picture is so far creditable to Mr. Kilburne that we suspect the title is a mere afterthought.

We must dismiss the rest of the drawings as rapidly as we can. Hayle Ferry (13), by Mr. F. Walton, is rather woolly, still it is bright and fairly well drawn.—A Girl (29), by Miss Kate Greenaway, is a quaint, richly coloured picture of a child in a huge hat.—Pines and Grapes (39) is, so far as we know, by much the best of Mr. Sherrin's fruit pieces, solid, well drawn and clear, and rich in colour; but one of the pines is too hot.—In Molly (55) Miss M. G. de Grival has contributed a well modelled and painted girl's head.—The Young Beanie Mother (69) of Mr. G. Bach is a capital technical exercise, the face being lit by reflected light.—The Skill and Thought of Bygone Days (80), by Miss M. Chase, a collection of bric-a-brac, is well and sympathetically painted, but the coarse Dutch dish of brass in the background is a mere metal cast, evincing neither thought nor skill, and its colour is too green.—Titania's Order (86), a company of fairies painted in his dainty and pretty manner by Mr. J. A. Fitz-Gerald, is noteworthy for fantastic grace and spirit.—Bereft (103), by Mr. W. H. Weatherhead, is remarkable for breadth of style and strength, but it is not free from conventionalities and traces of the lamp.—Waiting for the Tide, Dordrecht (118), by Mr. W. M. May, is a good picture of a placid river in misty sunlight, and it is harmonious, though rather artificial.—The Mushroom Gatherers (126) of Mr. J. Knight hardly differs from scores of landscapes he has painted previously; it is broad and effective, but it is also laboured, dark, and most distinctly woolly. Mr. Knight's mannerisms are so manifest in every element of this and other contributions of his that we wonder they do not weary him as much as they do his critics.—No. 129, by Mr. R. Carrick, The Lifeboat to the Rescue, is artificial; still, some of the drawing and modelling of a tumultuous sea is creditable, and it tells its story well.—Walberswick Harbour (141) proves that Mr. D. Green has seen similar subjects treated by Mr. T. N. Hemy, but otherwise it is not a plagiarism. The style employed is broad, simple, and Colman-like, while all the work is spirited.—Mr. B. Evans's The Duke's Country (187), a view of the Wharfe, is like a landscape seen in a feverish dream, heavily painted, crude in its coloration and in its shadows, blackish, though hot. There is much good drawing in the foliage. Compared with this, Mr. Hayes's Yarmouth Smack leaving Harbour (168) is thin and rather pale; still, it is pearly, and, though sadly mannered, accomplished.—Mr. C. R. Aston's Horse Rock and Mount's Bay (179) is clever, vivid, and, in its conventional way, strong. The sunlight on the waves and rugged land is brassy, and the verdure is too dark. His Evening Glow from the Rill Head (249) we like almost as well; its brilliance, golden light, and azure sea are charming. The artist has improved by avoiding being merely pretty, as he used to be.—On the other hand, Mr. Bamford's drawing of still life, Light Refreshment (190), is bright, cool, and solid.—The boat of Mr. W. A. Ingram's contributions in Tenat Hope and Despair (192), a good representation of a storm-battered wreck on a deep blue sea in bright sunlight, after a tempest. The story is well and clearly told, but much of the picture is poor stuff, and redolent of the lamp.—Her Love had Gone a-Sailing (221), by Mr. F. S. Spence, is so artificial that it reminds one of an opera scene. Still, the figure is delicate, and daintily painted.—One of the prettiest studies here is Mr. J. Scott's Playmates (242); the figures are spirited, and the design is fresh. We like this comparatively slight sketch much better than the artist's laboured illustrations of old legends, because it is spontaneous.—Broad, tender, and very pleasant is Mr. G. Wetherbee's Flock on the Downs (243).—Miss D. A. Deacon has excelled herself in the wonderfully elaborate and pearly Study of Shells (247), of which, nevertheless, she has not, for lack of grouping and chiaroscuro, made a picture in the true sense of the word.—An Autumn Garden (256), by Mr. A. Parsons, is worthy of his excellent taste and high reputation as a painter of such subjects.—Mr. Kilburne's Barbara Allen (276), although rather hard and chalky, is dexterously designed and neatly painted.—The End of the Meal (280) is one of Madame H. Ronner's clever sketches of cats.—Mr. L. Block long ago proved himself an excellent and laborious delineator of books and bric-à-brac, and his reputation ought to be increased by No. 329.—One of the most extraordinary mistakes ever made in art is that of Mr. H. M. Rheam in depicting Nimrod (472). This amazing production must have occupied months, and, in spite of its limitations and inconsistencies, illustrates technical skill of a sort which must have demanded for its attainment the studies of years, and not less toil than would have sufficed for, say, learning five languages. Such industry and patience deserved to be exercised upon a better design.

Besides the above the visitor will find productions of more or less merit by Messrs. E. Bale (not his best), O. Browne, F. G. Cotman, F. Dadd, V. and L. Davis, J. C. Dullman, A. East, W. M. Egley, P. H. Fisher, E. J. Gregory, H. Goodwin, H. Hine, E. Parton, C. Staniland, and W. B. Wollen, to none of which we refer specially, because they are not exceptionally good, and are only fairly representative of the artists.

NOTES FROM NUBIA.

II. Abou Simbel, Feb. 2, 1894.

OVER against Dakkeh we went to visit the great brick fort of Koban, which next to that at Semneh, above the second cataract, is the best specimen of the military architecture of the Pharaohs. The plan and dimensions of the fort were taken by Mr. Somers Clarke, whose professional skill helped us on every occasion to comprehend the remains which are so puzzling to any but an architect. The natives brought us into the desert to the east, till we reached a necropolis with shaft tombs cut in the rock, leading to chambers which they had rifled. Excavations at this spot would doubtless discover more such tombs, and give us details as to the men who built and dwelt in the fort.

Dakkeh itself gives us good evidence as to the date of the first Ergamenes (Arkamon in hieroglyphs) who was native king of the country. The naos built by him represents him as receiving gifts from Nubian goddesses, whose figures and dress suggest plainly the figures and dress of the present Nubian women, and differ completely from those of the conventional Egyptian deities. He also states that the Pharaoh (Peraa) gives to him the regions of the south. What Pharaoh it was he does not state. But the facts that in his own titles he assumes those of Philopator (Ptolemy IV.), and that this is also done by the Nubian king named in my last letter (Atkeranoun at Debôt), show that they must come shortly after, if not in the reign of, that king, and not of Philadelphus, as Diodorus says. This was Mr. Sayce's very just inference. To me it seemed further probable that the absence of details concerning the Pharaoh, which is unusual in such texts, points to the earliest years of Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes), when this king, being an infant, may not yet have received his official titles. At all events, the Nubian revolt, and the temporary cession of the country by the Ptolemies to the native dynasty—that of Ergamenes—are beyond all doubt, and so is the epoch of this cession, which must be placed about 200 B.C. The Egyptian style and the titles of these kings suggest that some at least of the literary classes in Egypt joined in the insurrection, and did work for the Ergamenes. Unfortunately there are no Ptolemaic inscriptions (except the remnant of a dedication of Ptolemy IX.) in Greek now to be seen, all the votive offerings being either dated in the reign of Tiberius or later.

Our next stage was Qurti, where but small traces still remain of the temple of Tothmes III., which was restored in Roman times. But the site itself has no small interest, for it is the first fertile spot in Nubia, with several large villages studding the west bank. When we landed, we saw that we were on a quondam island; for a long thread of green, leaving the Nile higher up, and enclosing with a curve a large piece of what is now desert, showed the former course of a branch of the Nile. On a hill about the middle of this long island was a great mound almost consisting of Roman pottery, and pointing to the island Tachompso of Herodotus, "the level country which the Nile flows round," twelve schœni (83 miles?) from Aswân. There is only one other such locality (and possibly Dakkeh) where the thread of green shows the old course, and where Sakyas far inland find ample water; it is the district of Anibe, to be mentioned presently.

Our visit to Maharrakah (Hierosykaminon of the ancients) did not turn out very satisfactory. For instead of finding the fifteen votive inscriptions which are to be seen in the 'C. I. G.', there were not more than eleven still extant, and the temple bore evidences of being upset by an earthquake, which (like that which upset the great temple of Olympia) struck it a blow from beneath the pavement, and sent nearly all the walls and pillars flying outwards. Five pillars are still standing, but the very strange plan of the building, drawn by Mr. Somers Clarke, showed that the pillars (six showing sideways and four front and back) were inside, not outside, the cella wall, in which no trace of door is now visible. The remains of a walled passage, leading from a smaller outside building into the south-east corner, suggested that here, at all events, was there access to the sanctuary. Such a plan has no precedent in either Egyptian or Greek architecture. On the smaller building the relief of the holy sycamore is still visible, and figures done in a barbarous mixture of Egyptian and late Roman style. On the centre of the wall of the peribolus (incase), and over against the only door of the naos, are remains in large capitals of a dedication in Greek, of which we could only read τῶν τοῦ καὶ τῶν ἐνδοῦ | τῶν γορευ καὶ γαυ | Μικτοῦ Ἀδελφ | ου.

This was the southernmost evidence we found of any dedication in Greek, and it was evidently rather Roman than Greek. Indeed, nothing is clearer than the fact that the Ptolemies did not think it worth their while to civilize this country, or to adorn it with any temples to the south of the Dodecaschenus (Tachompso), for of their predecessors the Pharaohs ample evidences remain. The eleventh, twelfth, eighteenth, and nineteenth dynasties are all still represented in temples and inscriptions throughout Southern Nubia; of the Ptolemies we could find no trace. Seeing then that we know of the expeditions of the second Ptolemy to Æthiopia for elephants, and of the marble throne set up by the third south of Massowa (inscription of Adule), it seems to follow that these kings used the Red Sea route, and struck into the country from Suakin and south of it. That they should have left no records on the rocks along the Nile, if they had held the country by that route, is almost improbable. I found, indeed, on one of the pillars of the beautiful temple built by Tothmes III. opposite Wadi Halfa, drilled in deeply, and in letters four to five inches high, the following names:—

· ΠΙΛΙΜΕ · ΝΗΚ ΚΥΡΗΝΑΙΟΣ Β
· ΙΑΣΩΝ ΚΥΡΗΝΑΙΟΣ Α

And on the next pillar ΑΔΑΜΑΣ.

But these solitary names, which seem to date from the fourth century B.C. (C and Z being used indifferently), are only evidence that Greek mercenaries, along with the Carians, who have left several inscriptions on the same building, held the place for some king, possibly for Darius, or even later.

The temple of Debûah, which we next visited, is one of those stupid memorials of Ramses II. which only tell us of the king's greatness, and give us long processions of his sons and daughters coming to do him homage. The king's own name is writ very large over every part of the building. But the avenue of sphinxes which led up to it from the river, and most of the temple itself, are buried under that golden sand which is invading and destroying all the western side of the Nubian Nile. It is, indeed, distressing to see not only ancient monuments, but recent culture, disappearing under this deadly invasion, which is splendid indeed to look at—beyond green trees and crops it often simulates golden fields of corn afar off—but which turns the fruitful land into a howling wilderness.

FROM PALACE TO PAWNHOP.

19, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

SOME ten days since I purchased at a public auction in London (the sale of the remaining stock of Mr. George Attenborough, pawnbroker, Strand) a fragment of an Assyrian bas-relief, measuring 14½ in. by 11½ in., with representation of three male figures. Two of them are apparently labourers carrying logs of wood, and the third appears to be the taskmaster, for he is urging them on by blows. Upon the back of the fragment is pasted a half-sheet of newspaper, discoloured by age, whereon is written:

A piece of sculpture cut from one of the slabs found in the mound of Kouyunjik (or Nineveh) which represents men employed in dragging the Human-headed bull to place in the Palace of the Kings of Assyria.

Discovered in the Year of our Lord 1850. Brought and presented to the Rev. Max Geneste by his very faithful and sincere friend, HORMUZD RASSAM.
West Cores, September 20, 1851.

I visited the British Museum, and in the Kouyunjik Gallery I found the other portion of the series to which my fragment originally belonged. It is only too clear that this and other portions are still missing, and I shall feel obliged if you, in the interests of archaeology, will kindly give space for those few lines, as they may induce those who still possess other fragments of this most valuable bas-relief to forward them to the British Museum.

I may add in conclusion that I have offered for the acceptance of the Trustees of the British Museum the fragment described above.

FRANCIS E. WHELAN.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 10th inst. the following, from the collection of the late Mr. J. Brand. Drawings: J. Bosboom, Interior of a Church, with figures, 50*l.*; J. Israels, Children sailing a Toy Boat, 188*l.*; A Girl and a Youth in a Country Lane, 152*l.*; Two Children at the Door of a Cottage, 173*l.*; J. Maris, A Belgian Town, on a river, 157*l.*; A Landscape, with windmill, winter, 50*l.*; A River Scene, with windmill, 63*l.*; A. Mauve, A Woody Road Scene, with peasant, 120*l.*; A Landscape, with cart and figures, 126*l.*; A Rustic Interior, with peasants seated at a table, 126*l.*; H. W. Mesdag, Dutch Fishing Boats off Scheveningen, 65*l.*; W. Tholen, Waiting for the Fishing Boats, 57*l.*; H. Witterday, A View in a Dutch Town, with boats, 75*l.*; Pictures: E. W. Cooke, Bear Head, Devon, with Exmouth in the distance, 210*l.*; W. Dyce, Pegwell Bay, a Recollection of October 5th, 1858, 635*l.*; Titian preparing to make the First Essay in Colours, 441*l.*; St. John leading Home his Adopted Mother, 430*l.*; King Lear and the Fool in the Storm, 210*l.*; J. C. Hook, The Boat, 504*l.*; J. Israels, Coming Ashore, 283*l.*; Sir J. E. Millais, A School Teacher, 105*l.*; J. Phillip, The Gleaner, 159*l.*

Five-3rd Family.

It is expected that Mr. Hook, who contributed less than he usually does to the Academy of last year, will more than compensate us for our loss on that occasion by the number and brilliancy of his pictures of 1894.

WHILE our readers will regret to hear that Sir John Millais will not be represented at the forthcoming Academy exhibition, they will be glad to know that he is rapidly recovering from the attack of influenza which prostrated him for several weeks, and was followed by a relapse rendering him unable to return from Scotland, where he now is, in order to finish the pictures intended for Burlington House, which were far advanced towards completion, and had been sent on to London when he intended starting for the South. Lady Millais, who is nursing her husband, has suffered still more severely from influenza; she is now quite convalescent.

THE National Gallery has been fortunate in securing, besides the Fra Angelico which is not yet hung, Dyce's coast piece 'Pegwell Bay,' which Sir F. Burton purchased, through Mr. Agnew, at Christie's on Saturday last. Although we still look forward to the nation possessing one of this painter's fine figure pictures, such as 'King Josiah shooting the Arrow of Deliverance,' the best version of 'The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel,' of which, by the way, a small but admirable copy does duty as an original, or 'The Madonna and Child,' the interesting landscape is, for the painter's sake, more than welcome. A delicate greyish whiteness pervades the picture, which is wonderfully finished, firmly drawn, exquisitely modelled and harmonious. It was exhibited at the Academy in 1860 as No. 141, 'Pegwell Bay, Kent, a Recollection of October 5th, 1858'; at Leeds as No. 1449 in 1868 (since that time it had remained in the possession of the late Mr. Brand); and at Manchester in 1887, No. 862.

We may perhaps be allowed to suggest to Sir F. Burton that it might be possible to obtain, at least on loan, for the National Gallery, John Cross's noble picture (one of the masterpieces of the English School) of 'The Death of Richard Cœur de Lion,' or 'Richard Cœur de Lion forgiving Bertrand de Gourdon,' which has long hung, half forgotten, in one of the committee rooms of the House of Lords, and has been engraved. It was No. 44 at Westminster Hall in 1847, and won for the artist a prize of 300*l.* The Government bought it of Cross for 500*l.* Cross died in 1861, aged forty-two.

MR. A. L. BALDREY is writing an account of 'The Life and Works of Albert Moore,' and will be glad of the help of the owners of pictures, drawings, or sketches by him, or of any other material of interest. Any communications addressed to Mr. Baldrey, care of Messrs. George Bell & Sons, would be welcome.

DR. BEZOLD has been appointed Professor of Oriental Philology at Heidelberg, but he has made such arrangements as will enable him to complete his 'Catalogue of the Kouyunjik Collection in the British Museum,' of which he has already published three volumes.

AMONG the new local features of the Imperial Museum at Constantinople is a large collection of Byzantine coins lately purchased, said to be valuable and complete. A catalogue is in preparation. The department of antiquities is on the point of being augmented by the erection of a new wing, in consequence of the discovery of sarcophagi and other objects at Gortyna. The antiquities from Pergamus will also be among its principal contents.

AN exhibition of pictures at the Art Gallery, Aberdeen, will be opened in September next, remaining open till the close of the year.

THE Society of Painter-Etchers has collected more than three hundred and fifty prints of very unequal value and varying much in style, as to which it may suffice to say that, besides certain Milletts and A. Van Ostades, the visitor will be rewarded who studies the contributions of Messrs. A. East, A. Evershed, J. Finnie, Van Gravesande, A. H. Haig, Helleu, J. P. Heseltine, T. Huson, D. Law, A. Legros, R. Macbeth, L. Monziès, F. Short, and E. Slacombe.

THE results of Dr. Dörpfeld's excavations this winter in search of the site of the fountain of the Nine Springs may be thus summarized: the aqueduct, built like that of Eupalinus in Samos, followed the ancient road leading to the Acropolis, while below the reservoir, into which the aqueduct of Pisistratus emptied itself, another reservoir had been constructed at a later date, to contain the water flowing from the slopes of the hill of the Nymphs and to conduct it to the agora. During the work several objects of archaeological value came to light, amongst which is a relief of the Phrygian god Men, who, as appears from inscriptions and various extant representations, was worshipped as a divinity in connexion with water and rain; also two heads, both portraits of the same person, known to us from other remains, but still unidentified by name; as well as two small figurines, one in crystal, the other in alabaster. The last represents a Victory (Nike) exquisitely chiselled, while the former is a fragmentary group, consisting of a man fighting a lion, and was probably portion of a glass vessel.

AT Athens works have been set afoot for enclosing the Dipylon necropolis, where one of the sepulchral monuments has recently been maliciously mutilated. At the first clearing of the soil, at a very small depth, was discovered a subterranean watercourse, which is thought to be the ancient Eridanus, vestiges of which had already been identified during the past year in other parts of the city.

PROF. LAMBROS writes from Athens:—

"Dr. H. G. Lolling, who died here on the 22nd of February, was well known to archaeologists by his long career of active labour in Greece. The deceased was for many years Librarian of the German Archaeological Institute at Athens, which came into existence in 1874; and when he retired from the post he entered, in 1888, into the Greek service, and being placed by the Minister of Education as the head of the Epigraphical Section of the Central Museum, he became a zealous contributor to the ἀρχαιολογικὸν δελτίον, issued by the General Ephorate of Antiquities. He also displayed his activity in epigraphic studies by articles in the Mittheilungen and the ἀρχαιολογικὰ ἱερίσματα, as well as in other archaeological journals. Of great importance will be the Corpus of Boeotian Inscriptions, the editing of which had been entrusted to him by the Berlin Academy. He had prepared it, and a good deal of it had been put in type. His labours at the Central Museum had proved fruitful of results. The ordering, arranging, and cataloguing of the inscriptions was a work in which he delighted, and showed much special knowledge. But Lolling was not a mere epigraphist: he had bestowed time and exertion on the geography of Greece. He made numberless journeys, partly for his own instruction and partly for the compilation of Baedeker's guide to Greece, and thereby he was enabled to identify many localities more accurately, to discover new sites, and improve markedly our knowledge of Greek topography. The results of these long-continued inquiries are to be found in Baedeker's handbook, and in the 'Hellenischen Landeskunde und Topographie,' which appeared in the third volume of Ivan Müller's 'Handbook of Classical Antiquity.' The latter is also interesting for this reason, that in his bibliography Lolling was in a position to give a full account of the contributions of the natives of modern Greece to the geography of their country. Besides these books Lolling printed in journals and fugitive publications many articles on geography. Among the sites with the topography of which his name is indissolubly connected are Marathon, Salamis, and Artemesium."

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—London Symphony Concerts.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
QUEEN'S HALL.—Philharmonic Concerts.

THE gratifying support accorded this season to Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts testifies to the soundness of opinion on the part of musical amateurs, although it is unquestionably trying that they should have waited seven years before fully recognizing the value of the enterprising manager's labours in their behalf. The programme of the seventh concert, on Thursday last week, was mainly familiar, the one exception being a Violin Concerto in c by the Russo-German composer Moszkowski, Op. 30. Hitherto he has been known chiefly by his refined salon music for the pianoforte, but he is the author of several works of a more important character, at present little known in this country. In his violin concerto the hearer is at once struck by the melodious nature of the themes. In each of the three movements they are singularly fresh and genial, but equal praise cannot be given to their treatment, what is generally known as the "working out" being for the most part vague and uninteresting. In this the composer resembles Rubinstein, whose subjects in his instrumental works are, as a rule, tuneful, though their development is unsatisfactory, and in entire contrast to Brahms, who frequently makes much out of apparently weak material. Herr Moszkowski's concerto was played fluently and brilliantly by M. Émile Sauret, special praise being due to him for the purity of his harmonic notes at the close of the second movement. The orchestral items in the programme, all of which were rendered with noteworthy force and intelligence, were Beethoven's Symphony in c minor, the same composer's 'Leonora' Overture, No. 3, and the Prelude to 'Lohengrin.' Mrs. Henschel contributed the cavatina "Und ob die Wolke" from 'Der Freischütz,' and a daintily orchestrated version of her husband's charming song 'Spring.' A Beethoven programme, including the 'Choral' Symphony, will be presented at the final concert on April 5th.

At the Crystal Palace Concert last Saturday, Herr Joachim made his annual appearance, and played Brahms's enormously difficult Violin Concerto in d, and Beethoven's Romance in f, showing the same magnificent "form" that he has displayed throughout this season. The Hungarian artist's 'Elegiac' Overture, first performed by the Cambridge University Musical Society on March 8th, 1877, when he took his honorary degree of Doctor in Music, and Raff's 'Lenore' Symphony were the principal works for orchestra in this programme. Miss Florence Monteith earned the approbation of the audience as the vocalist of the afternoon in the air "Nuit resplendissante" from Gounod's 'Cinq Mars,' and a pretty song 'The Wild Flower,' by Signor Franco Leoni, the latter, in which the soprano singer was most acceptable, being accompanied by the composer.

The repetition of Tchaikowsky's Symphony in b minor, No. 6, at the second Philharmonic Concert on Wednesday evening, was to be commended on all grounds. The measure of genius and what, for want of a better term, may be called vitality in this work is extraordinary, and of course its originality and general merits became more conspicuous on a second hearing. The coda of the third movement is truly monumental in force, and the dying away of the music at the close of the adagio lamentoso is wonderfully suggestive of the Oriental nirvana. If this was indeed Tchaikowsky's "swan song," no composer ever uttered a final lay more powerful and thrilling. Of the rest of the programme there is little to be said. Musicians know very well how Miss Fanny Davies plays Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in c, No. 4, and the young pianist was heard at her best on this occasion. The effective and appropriate cadenzas were those of Madame Schumann. M. Émile Sauret gave a masterly performance of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's 'Pibroch,' his intonation being accurate in the most difficult passages. The vocalist was Madame de Vère-Sapio, who displayed a powerful and well-cultivated soprano voice in the scene "A vos yeux" from Ambroise Thomas's 'Hamlet,' and the prayer "O Virgin Mother" from Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride.'

Musical Society.

THE thirty-sixth series of the Popular Concerts is now drawing to a close, but Mr. Arthur Chappell still continues to make additions to his catalogue of works in the repertory. Last Saturday three of Thalberg's pianoforte studies were introduced for the first time by Mlle. Eibenschütz. They are the examples in raharp minor, a minor, and a flat minor; and, as Schumann states, they are agreeable and playable, but are salon studies, which masculine players and hearers could not long tolerate. Still they were worth a hearing, and Mlle. Eibenschütz played them extremely well. The statement in the book that "the name of Thalberg is found only once before (June 17th, 1885) in these programmes" involves an error. It should be January, 1885. In the absence of Herr Joachim, who was playing at the Crystal Palace, Lady Halle once more occupied the position of leader, the concerted works being Beethoven's Quartet in a minor, Op. 59, No. 2, and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in a minor, Op. 25. Mr. Santley introduced no fewer than six songs by Mrs. Ellen Wright, tastefully written lyrics, decidedly above the average of ordinary English ballads.

On Monday nothing was done calling for extended notice. Brahms's often-repeated Sextet in a flat, Op. 18, opened the programme. Herr Schönberger played Chopin's Ballade in f major; Herr Joachim gave his favourite Tartini sonata 'Il Trillo del Diavolo,' with Spohr's Barcarolle in c as an encore; and the concert ended with Nos. 1, 2, and 4 of Schumann's 'Stücke im Volkston' for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 102. For some reason hard to decipher, the other numbers of this series of genre pieces are never heard at the Popular Concerts. Vocal items were contributed by Miss Schidrowitz and Miss Zagury, their efforts as duettists being noteworthy for finish and perfect understanding in intonation.

By a remarkable coincidence, Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti will both complete the fiftieth year of their first appearance in England during the present season. In recognition of this event there will be an assemblage of musicians and amateurs at the Grafton Galleries next Thursday, when an address will be presented to the two distinguished instrumentalists, the gathering having been hastily convened by Sir George Grove, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, and Mr. Hermann Klein.

THE Sunday performances at the South Place Institute will close for the season tomorrow (Sunday). In the afternoon Mr. E. F. Jacques will give a lecture on Schumann as composer and critic, with musical illustrations; and the final concert in the evening will consist entirely of Schumann's works, including the Pianoforte Quintet in e flat, Op. 44; the Quartet in a minor, Op. 41, No. 1; and the 'Faschingschwank aus Wien,' Op. 26.

A SYMPHONY in A by the young Scottish composer Mr. Frederic Lamond has been recently published at Frankfurt, and is highly praised by the Allgemeine Musikzeitung.

THE ballet music from Tchaikowsky's opera 'Voyvoda' was performed for the first time in England at Sir Charles Halle's Manchester concert on Thursday last week.

BACH's music is but little heard in France, but a performance on a large scale of the 'St. Matthew Passion' is to be given at the Porte Saint Martin Theatre in Paris on Good Friday.

MM. SCHOTT, the well-known music publishing firm, announce a competition for a solemn march for orchestra, to be performed at the opening of the Antwerp Exhibition on the 1st of May next. The prize will be 200, and the competition is open to composers of all countries. Manuscripts must be sent in by April 5th to MM. Schott frères, 82, Montagne de la Cour, Brussels.

PERFORMANCES NEXT WEEK

Mon.	Popular Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
Tue.	Royal Academy of Music students' Concert, 2, St. James's Hall.
Wed.	London Congregational Union, 'The Messiah,' 6, Queen's Hall.
Thu.	Concert of Sacred Music, 2, Crystal Palace.
Fri.	Royal Choral Society, 'The Messiah,' 7, Albert Hall.
Sat.	Mr. Ambrose Austin's Sacred Concert, 7, 30, St. James's Hall.
Sun.	Sacred Concert, 7, 30, Queen's Hall.
	Crystal Palace Concert, 8.
	Drury Lane Theatre, 7, 8, 'Maritana.'

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

ADELPHI.—'The Cotton King,' a Drama in Four Acts. By SUTTON VANE.

THE merits of the new Adelphi drama of Mr. Sutton Vane are superficial. On the strength of some fairly effective situations and some rather whimsical dialogue, the whole won a favourable reception. It will not, however, bear reconsideration. To apply to plays of this class the tests customary in the case of work of high aim is useless. Instead of being flattered by the compliment involved in judging their productions by the standard of literature, Mr. Pinero and some among his fellows complain of injustice when work humble in aim, but accomplishing what is required of it, receives a recognition difficult to award to more ambitious and more meritorious efforts. This is all wrong. To extract materials from all sources and to concoct an Adelphi drama is no easy matter; to write a 'Second Mrs. Tanqueray' is a work of extreme difficulty. 'The Cotton King' fulfils exactly the requirements of Adelphi drama, and is equal in value to three out of four of the works so classified, though inferior to the other fourth. It has a sympathetic love story, some theatrically effective situations, and a comic underplot which is not wholly original, but is amusing and acceptable. Virtue is put to straits as sore as ever afflicted it, and vice in high quarters develops with marvellous alacrity into crime. These things granted, and the public satisfied, what more remains to be said? Little or nothing. Reflection shows us that the chief villain possesses a power such as that after which Faustus pined, and finds tools ready to accomplish every act of infamy he conceives; that the hero, though the shrewdest of Americans, walks blindfold into every pitfall provided him; that the disposition of events is arbitrary; and that the pathetic inevitableness of the real drama is wanting. What is of more importance, the public is conducted purposelessly, as it seems, down blind alleys, and is deliberately mocked and derided. For a monster of villainy, whose crimes would stand conspicuous in the pages of Suetonius, the vaguest and probably most trifling of punishments is reserved. Yet the most truculent of his agents announces his readiness to swing for his sake, and another conscientious and angry gentleman, bent on vicariously avenging a wrong not his, follows him up and down with a gun that resolutely refuses to go off. These are dangerous liberties to take with a public, and when to these things it is added that there is no reason for the prolongation of the action or its arrest except the fiat of the author, and that the play might with consummate ease and with some gain be reduced to two acts, while it might with no great difficulty be indefinitely expanded, it may be seen that the public has something to forgive. The demand made upon it, however, is readily conceded, and the whole is a success. The piece is very well played. Mr. Cartwright has a dialect part, in which he exhibited some fine and effective acting; and Miss Alma Stanley revealed comic gifts from which the stage has much to hope. Miss Marion Terry, making a first appearance at the Adelphi, of which her sister was for some years a mainstay, played with customary pathos, distinction, and charm. Miss Hall Caine, to whose merits managers are at length opening their eyes, was natural, pleasing, and sympathetic as the victim of masculine falsehood. Mr. Charles Warner played with customary earnestness as the hero, and Mr. Arthur Williams was humorous in a character designed apparently for him.

Dramatic Gossip.

MISS FLETCHER's new play is in rehearsal at the Garrick Theatre. It is serious in interest. The principal parts will be taken by Mr. Hare, Mr. Forbes Robertson, Miss Kate Borko, and Miss Elizabeth Robins.

MISS BEATRICE HATTON, a young actress whose performances at the Lyceum, the Comedy, and other theatres have attracted attention, and who is now in 'The Transgressor' at the Court, is the author of 'Enid Lyle,' a story which, after appearing anonymously in a weekly journal, will be issued in two volumes by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

DALY'S THEATRE will be closed during the early part of Holy Week, but will reopen on the 24th. 'Twelfth Night' will then be given until May 5th. On the 7th Signora Duse will reappear. Particulars of the pieces in which she will be seen are yet wanting. It is to be hoped that the French drama, in which her chief success has been made, will be more largely represented than it was last year.

At the close, on Saturday night last, of the run of the Drury Lane pantomime a presentation of plate was made to Sir Augustus Harris by the members of the company. In acknowledging the gift the manager of Drury Lane said that the new lease will begin next Boxing Day, when he proposes to produce a pantomime on the subject of Aladdin. Before that time he hopes to give a drama written by himself, Mr. Henry Hamilton, and Mr. Cecil Raleigh.

A FULL list of the characters in Mr. Jones's new play on the point of production at the St. James's has been given, but the name of the piece itself has not yet been fixed.

LONG runs are out of favour at the Strand, which theatre closed on Saturday last. The next experiment will be with a new burlesque, announced, not too happily, as 'Jaunty Jane Shore.'

MR. DONOVAN, who has played successfully in Mr. and Mrs. Kendal's company, has elected to remain for the present in America as a member of Mr. Frohman's company.

'MISS RUTLAND,' "an original play of modern life," by Mr. Richard Pryce, is to be given, by permission of Mr. Comyns Carr, some afternoon this month at a theatre as yet unnamed.

NOW READY.

WOMEN of LETTERS. Memoirs of Lady Morgan, the Misses Berry, Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Lady Ann Barnard, Mary Countess Cowper, Mrs. Opie, Lady Duff Gordon, Elizabeth Inchbald, "Lamb's Duchess," Lady Hervey, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Mrs. Delany, and Mrs. Montagu. By GERTRUDE TOWNSHEND MAYER. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

"These are delightful volumes. The authoress has not only chosen good subjects, but she has the gift of piecing together her information skilfully, and of endowing the characters she depicts with some of her own vigour and vitality."—Spectator.

"A couple of volumes which are sure and deserve to find many readers. It is impossible, in these busy days, for many people to study biographical matter at first hand. The field is too wide; and the average man or woman is grateful to the writer who, surveying that field, brings away from it all that is essential, and presents it in concise, clear, picturesque fashion. That is what the author has done in the present instance. She gives us the concentrated extract of many a memoir, autobiography, diary, and what not; and she serves it up in an appetising way. She eschews, for the most part, literary criticism, dwelling principally upon the lives and characters of her subjects."—Globe.

NEW NOVELS AT THE LIBRARIES.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

The GREATER GLORY. By Maarten Maartens, Author of 'The Sin of Joost Avelingb,' 'An Old Maid's Love,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The name of Maarten Maartens is becoming—indeed, it has already become—one of the most important and significant names in the literature of contemporary fiction.....We could point to scenes and situations of exceptional power and beauty, but we leave them to the many who, we hope, will read this admirable and striking novel."—Spectator.

"The book is more than clever—bright and witty, and full of shrewd common sense."

St. James's Gazette.

"Rich in epigram and humour, both incisive and original, this work will rank among its author's best efforts."—Morning Post.

"No review can do justice to the many deep and delicate studies in this careful, brilliant, and picturesque book."—Daily Chronicle.

NOW READY.

A DEVOTED COUPLE. By J. Masterman, Author of 'The Scotts of Bestminster.' 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Miss Yonge seems to have flung her mantle over the author of 'A Devoted Couple,' and to have found a worthy successor. The story is a family one, full of sweet domesticities of English family life with a spice of Indian adventure thrown in. A most agreeable, clever, and wholesome story."—Scotsman.

NOW READY.

The ROMANCE of SHERE MOTE. By Percy Hulburd, Author of 'In Black and White.' 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"A story of singular ingenuity and power—an album, so to speak, of brilliant character-sketches, graphic word-pictures, and trenchant epigrams."—Daily Telegraph.

TRAVELS IN INDIA A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

By THOMAS TWINING,

A Civil Servant of the Honourable East India Company.

Preserved by his Son,

THOMAS TWINING, of Twickenham,
AND

Edited by the Rev. WILLIAM H. G. TWINING, Vicar of St. Stephen's, Westminster.

With Portrait and Map, demy 8vo. cloth extra, 16s.

THOMAS TWINING was one of the energetic Englishmen who laid the foundations of the Indian Empire. He arrived in India in 1792. He quitted it finally in 1805. In the interval he had been entrusted with the reform of an extensive department of the public administration, had been appointed judge of a great district, had held the charge of a country containing more than ten thousand towns and villages, and more than two millions of people.

The ATHENÆUM of March 10, 1894, says:—

"His style, clear, scholarly, and elegant, seems to harmonize with the portrait in the frontispiece, and with the close of the 'porwig' period in our ordinary dress. As a record of Indian travel his book deserves a place beside the corresponding works of Bernier and Tavernier."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"One of the most interesting and instructive narratives illustrative of native decline and fall and early English civilization which it has ever been our good fortune to read. There is a simplicity, a self-reliance, and an observancy in the Diary which makes it very pleasant reading."

TIMES.—"The attractiveness of Twining's narrative depends not so much upon exciting adventure as upon its picturesque, and the general view it presents of Hindostan in the heyday of barbaric splendour and turbulence."

IRISH TIMES.—"There is no 'Indian' who will not read the book with pleasure."

SCOTSMAN.—"Students of Indian history may be able to find some valuable things in these pages."

GLOBE.—"It gives a picture of the Indian life of that day which is obviously trustworthy and often deeply interesting."

MORNING POST.—"The special charm of this volume is its old-world character, its delightful simplicity, and the absence of all straining for effect."

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"It would be difficult to name a recent volume of travels at once so entertaining and so instructive."

OUR AIN FOLK:

Being Memories of Manse Life in the Mearns and a Crack about Auld Times.

By JAMES INGLIS.

"In its construction and general tone 'Our Ain Folk' reminds the reader of Dr. Norman Macleod's 'Reminiscences of a Highland Parish,' whilst it contains a store of admirable Scottish stories, many of them quite new to us, that can only be compared in quality to the classic collection of Jean Hanny. 'Our Ain Folk' is a gem. Every page is brightened either by a vivid description of scenery, a comical anecdote, or a witty retort, and the reader must be a morose mortal indeed who does not enjoy the brisk humour of the narrative."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE CASTELLATED & DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE OF SCOTLAND.

By DAVID MACGIBBON and THOMAS ROSS.

"It is hardly possible to exaggerate the labour involved in the production of the present work, or to speak too highly of the accuracy and completeness of the illustrations and the illustrations. The authors are fairly entitled to boast that they have placed before the reader the minutest particulars about every edifice, castle, peel tower, picture, or ruin between Chisham and the southern coast of Scotland. For clearness of outline, fidelity of detail, and uniformity of execution the illustrations are truly admirable."—Saturday Review.

THE QUICKENING OF CALIBAN.

A MODERN STORY OF EVOLUTION.

By J. COMPTON RICKETT,
 Author of 'The Christ that is to be.'

"Mr. Compton Rickett must be congratulated alike on the daring conception and the skilful execution of his book. A style at once simple and powerful lends distinction to 'The Quickening of Caliban,' and the story itself is one of strong interest.... A weirdly attractive story, cleverly imagined and vigorously told."—Speaker.

"Brimsful of meaning, suggestion, and fine satire."

Academy.

"There is a good deal of good workmanship in the book."

Bookman.

"The daring theme is justified by the deft way in which Mr. Rickett has carried out his task."—Public Opinion.

XIX^e SIÈCLE. 1 vol. 16 1/2, broché, 3 fr. 50.

Dans une monographie écrite d'un style à la fois précis et coloré, M. Chevrillon fait revivre avec son héros Sydney Smith toute cette phalange de sages et de grands hommes que l'histoire de la politique intérieure de l'Angleterre pendant la première moitié de ce siècle (l'empire inébranlable des idées libérales qu'il défendit dans la Review of Edinburgh et dans les Lectures de Peterborough, toujours reçues avec admiration par les Anglais, Sydney Smith, poète, orateur au début de sa vie, parvenu enfin aux plus hautes dignités de l'Église anglicane, eut la satisfaction d'asseoir sa triomphe complet de son programme politique, c'est-à-dire à l'émancipation des catholiques (1829) et à la sécularisation (1832). La lucidité de son style et les nuances d'un humour irrésistible lui avaient assuré une influence prolongée sur l'opinion publique. C'est en somme, à défaut de celle d'un publiciste de grande importance, de son sens, de l'humanité et de l'esprit pratique.

MARK RUTHERFORD'S NEW NOVEL.—SECOND EDITION.

CATHERINE FURZE.

2 vols. cloth, 12s.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"By far the most impressive, original, and interesting work of fiction that has fallen into our hands for many a month."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A simple and touching story, told with rare skill and power."

SCOTSMAN.—"Can be read many times by the same reader before its interest is exhausted."

CHRISTIAN WORLD.—"Mark Rutherford has treated a risky conception with rare skill and delicacy.... Fascinates the reader."

ATHENÆUM.—"A book by 'Mark Rutherford' is quite a treat.... 'Catherine Furze' should be read not once, but many times."

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster-square, E.C.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW STORY.—SECOND EDITION.

The RAIDERS. By the Author of 'The Stickit Minister,' &c. Crown 8vo.
 cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"The First Large Edition having been exhausted on the day of publication, a Second Edition has been prepared. The new Barrie of yesterday is to-day a second Stevenson—and no bad second, let us make haste to add.... Mr. Crockett writes exceedingly well—crisply, vividly, and above all readably. His Scotch is delightful, and frequent, though somewhat capriciously distributed, parenthetical translations smooth the thistly path for the Southron. He has a keen sense of humorous character."—Daily Chronicle.

"It is safe to say that this tale of the Galloway of the early part of last century will bring Mr. Crockett at a bound in the front rank of those writers of the day who may be said to have founded among them a new school of Scottish romance. 'The Raiders' is alive and throbbing with the Galloway spirit; the strong and wholesome air of the hills and seas of the Stewartry blows through it."—Scotzman.

A NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

A MODERN HERETIC.

THE STORY OF A SCHISMATIC.

A NOVEL WITH A PURPOSE.

Crown 8vo. cloth, Five Shillings.

Dr R. P. Hutton says:—"A more merry, wholesomely funny book it has not been my lot to read from any of our living authors. In addition to the humour, there is a constantly occurring felicity of phrase which reminds one of George Meredith."

Glasgow Herald.—"A very remarkable and distinguished book. The author has done for the Oxford of 1850 something like what Mrs. Humphry Ward did for the Oxford of a later generation; but in place of a revolt from Christianity, we have only a revolt from Anglicanism as the momentary type of the search after truth, and thus we are spared such a portentous endeavour as the New Brotherhood."

THE REPUBLIC as a FORM OF GOVERNMENT;
 Or, the Evolution of Democracy in America.

By JOHN SCOTT, of Farquhar.

Post 8vo. pp. 128, 7s. 6d.

We have in this book a criticism by one of its citizens of the government of the United States. It invites attention now when a change is threatened in the British Constitution which would turn it into a Republic. It may be well to look before we leap. The author says of his work:—"It is an examination into the working and principle of the government of the United States.... An humble contribution to the government which a democratic revolution endangers the stability of Europe."—Extract from the Introduction.

A NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

A MODERN HERETIC.

THE STORY of a SCHISMATIC.

A NOVEL WITH A PURPOSE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, Five Shillings.

Dr. R. F. Heston says:—"A more merry, wholesome, sunny book is hard to find than this, and one that is so living and so true. In addition to the humour, there is a constantly recurring felicity of phrase which reminds one of George Meredith."

George Meredith—"A very remarkable and distinguished book. The author has done for the Oxford of 1860 something like what Mrs. Humphry Ward did for the Oxford of a later generation. But in place of a revolt from Christianity, we have only a revolt from Anglicanism; the momentary type of the search after truth and thus we are spared such a painful and endearing as the New Brotherhood."

James Clarke & Co. 15 and 14, Fleet-street, London.

"Messrs. Bell are determined to do more than maintain the reputation of 'Bohn's Libraries.'"

Guardian, October 8, 1890.
"The imprint of 'Bohn's Standard Library' is a guarantee of good editing."—Critic (N. Y.), November 22, 1890.

"Let me say, in passing, that you can hardly make a mistake in purchasing from 'Bohn's Libraries,' issued by Messrs. Bell. They consist of really standard books at very low prices, well bound, well printed, well edited, and a lasting satisfaction to the purchaser."

Dr. Nicoll, in the British Weekly, March 10, 1891.

"There is a mine of interest attached to every colony, and that all the more of value as it is not readily to be got at in any other book but this. The author has done his work well, is clear and concise in all his statements, and has arranged his matter in a clear and explicit manner. The information at his disposal is the best obtainable, being in great measure secured from the Colonial Office and the Governors of the Colonies of which he treats."—European Mail.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

2 vols. 8vo. 22s.

LETTERS OF HARRIET COUNTESS GRANVILLE, 1810-1845.

Edited by her Son, the Hon. F. LEVESON GOWER.

Truth.—"The collection of letters of Lady Granville is certainly the most entertaining and important work of the kind which has appeared since the Greville Memoirs. The book is full of capital and quite new stories about celebrated people, and both volumes are most delightful reading."

Index Chronicle.—"Two more delightful volumes for people with memories we sorely know. They almost deserve to rank with the Memoirs of De Gammon. All 'Society' is shown as in a mirror without a facet or a flaw in it, and how nice reading that is for those who already know something of the period need not be told to-day."

Daily Telegraph.—"This most delightful and most discursive letter-writer. All kinds of figures appear; not only great people like George IV. and the Duke of Wellington, and the Duke de Bruggie and Lord Brougham—to say nothing of Queen Victoria herself—but a wonderful variety of lesser lights, men and women who were for the nonce the social rage, or who had done something to amuse or shock, irritate or excite, inflame or depress, the circle in which they moved."

THE BADMINTON LIBRARY. NEW VOLUMES.

BIG GAME SHOOTING. By CLIVE PHILLIPPS-WOLLEY. With Contributions by Sir SAMUEL W. BAKER, W. C. OSWELL, F. J. JACKSON, WARREN PIRK, F. C. SELOUS, W. A. BAILLIE-GROHMAN, Lord KILMOREY, ST. GEORGE LITTLEDALE, &c. With 37 Plates and 113 Illustrations in the Text. Vol. I. AFRICA and AMERICA. Vol. II. EUROPE, ASIA, and the ARCTIC REGIONS. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. each.

SHARPS and FLATS: a Complete Revelation of the Secrets of Cheating at Games of Chance and Skill. By JOHN NEVIL MACKENZIE, of the Egyptian Hall. With 62 Illustrations and Diagrams. Crown 8vo. 6s.

This book constitutes a complete exposure of the methods and devices employed in cheating at the present day, and a revelation of the whole of the secrets of the modern gaming sharp. It is a work absolutely unique of its kind, nothing at all approaching it having ever before been published in any language.

SECOND EDITION.

NEW STORY,
THE RAIDERS:

BEING SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF JOHN FEA, LORD AND EARL OF LITTLE EGYPT.

BY

S. R. CROCKETT,

Author of 'The STICKIT MINISTER,' &c.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

. The First Large Edition having been exhausted on the day of publication, a Second Edition has been prepared.

"The new Barrie of yesterday is to-day a second Stevenson—and no bad second, let us make haste to add.....Mr. Crockett writes exceedingly well—crisply, vividly, and above all readably. His Scotch is delightful and frequent, though somewhat capriciously distributed parenthetical translations smooth the thistly path for the Southron. He has a keen sense of humorous character."

Daily Chronicle.

"It is safe to say that this tale of the Galloway of the early part of last century will bring Mr. Crockett at a bound into the front rank of those writers of the day who may be said to have founded among them a new school of Scottish romance. 'The Raiders' is alive and throbbing with the Gallowegian spirit; the strong and wholesome air of the hills and seas of the Stewartry blows through it."—Scotsman.

"The book has merits: merits of humour, character, description, dialects."—National Observer.

"Mr. Crockett has written a very able, original, and stirring Scots romance."—Glasgow Herald.

"The wild Solway smugglers, already famous in fiction, live again in Mr. Crockett's pages; the billmen and gypsies rob and reive, the law-abiding citizens hunt them down, and there is a rapid succession of stirring adventures on sea and land. The reading public will undoubtedly seize upon 'The Raiders' and devour it eagerly. Nothing so tempting has been provided for some time."

Dundee Advertiser.

"Mr. Crockett can write admirably; and indeed his book as a whole is excellently well written."—British Weekly.

"The Earl of Little Egypt is a singular figure, well conceived and powerfully drawn. But the charm of the book is in the sense with which its every part is suffused, of the free life of the open country, of sea and moor and mountains, and of the strong human characters which that life produces—a sense which makes the town-bound citizen long to find himself amid these scenes, and to fill his lungs with the breezes which blow there."—Christian World.

Life's Little Ironies, and A Few Crusted Characters. By Thomas Hardy. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

"WHAT'S the good of anything?—why nothing," the refrain of Mr. Chevalier's latest vocal exposition of coeter philosophy, is only a vulgar way of expressing the text which is almost invariably illustrated by Mr. Hardy's magnificently sombre pictures of Wessex life; and 'Life's Little Ironies,' as the title implies, is no exception to the rule. Honour, love, self-sacrifice, success, and pride of birth, all are turned to bitterness and hopeless failure by the ironical swing of circumstance over which man has no control.

Alike for those who for To-day prepare
And those that after some To-morrow stare,

A Mueskin from the Tower of Darkness cries,
"Fools! your Reward is neither Here nor There."

So sang the Persian poet in his incomparable panegyric of pessimism; to the same effect speaks Mr. Hardy, here as ever faithful to his mission of unmasking Providence. The justification or the condemnation of Mr. Hardy's attitude towards life is no concern of the literary critic; for his art in conveying the tragic aspect of it there is little but praise. There is, perhaps, nothing so weirdly powerful in this volume as 'The Three Strangers' or 'The Withered Arm' of 'Wessex Tales,' but 'A Tragedy of Two Ambitions' is more impressive as an expression of hopeless despair than anything in the former volume; for what makes the gloom all the more effective in this is that outward success attends the efforts of the brothers: they attain the distinguished position in the Church for which they had striven, the sister for whom they had sacrificed themselves is happy and prosperous and loves them, but there is just one memory of a rescuing hand delayed that no success will kill.

"But now I often feel that I should like to put an end to trouble here in the self-same spot." 'I have thought of it myself,' said Joshua. 'Perhaps we shall some day,' murmured his brother. 'Perhaps,' said Joshua, moodily. With that contingency to consider in the silence of their nights and days they bent their steps homewards."

And so we turn to the next story, 'On the Western Circuit,' which as a tale of two utterly wasted lives is sad, and would be sadder if it were not for a slight sense of improbability left by the conduct of the heroine: if she had loved Raye as she did, she could never have allowed that miserable marriage to take place without a word of warning or a hint of the true state of things in spite of her feeling of loyalty to the girl. Still, even so it is an effective story, and Mr. Hardy, who excels pre-eminently in those little half-sketched glimpses that suggest the whole horror of a situation, reveals an appalling vista of dreariness for the two united lives in that final touch of the railway journey.

But however great may be the artistic pleasure to be derived from these stories so admirably told, it is almost with a feeling of relief as from some oppressive nightmare that one turns from their weight of implacable doom to the second part, entitled 'A Few Crusted Characters.' The device which introduces these stories, resembling to a certain extent that of 'A Group of Noble Dames,' is ingenious. The village omnibus running from a certain market town to Longpuddle has just started with its full freight of passengers, when it is hailed by a stranger for whom room is made with difficulty. He turns out to be a native of Longpuddle, who had emigrated twenty-five years before to Australia, and is now returning to renew his acquaintance with his native place, so he persuades each of the other occupants of the conveyance in turn to tell him a story of the inhabitants that he had known in his youth. By this form of narrative the stories gain an added flavour from the racy Wessex idioms in which they are told. Several of these tales are pathetic in the same way as the other stories by what might be called the capricious certainty of the ill-luck, but most of them are told simply with a view to humorous effect; and when Mr. Hardy has made up his mind not to be gloomy, he has hardly a peer among living writers for pure and direct fun. 'Tony Kytes, the Arch Deceiver,' with his triple burden of enamoured damsels, is a character worthy of Marguerite de Navarre or of Balzac in his merriest mood; and the story of 'Absent-Mindedness in a Parish Choir' comes very near it. After their misadventure in church, which must be read to be enjoyed, the situation is summed up in this delightful paragraph:—

"Not if the Angels of Heaven," says the squire (he was a wickedish man, the squire was, though now for once he happened to be on the Lord's side), 'not if the Angels of Heaven come down,' he says, 'shall one of you villainous players ever sound a note in this church again; for the insult to me, and my family, and my visitors, and God Almighty, that you've perpetrated this afternoon!'

We almost wish Mr. Hardy would give us rather more of his humour instead of quite so much pessimism; still, with such admirable examples of both as are to be found in the present volume, complaint is, perhaps, ungracious.

The Lower Slopes. By Grant Allen. (Methuens & Lane.)

THE full title of Mr. Grant Allen's new book, when it has been disentangled from an elaborate and singularly ineffective title-page, reads as follows: 'The Lower Slopes: Reminiscences of Excursions round the Base of Helicon, undertaken for the most part in Early Manhood: by Grant Allen.' Such a title is not encouraging. It is the title of an uneasy rhetorician, not the title of a poet. But it shows an apparent lack of humour, which is not entirely confirmed by the contents of the book. Mr. Allen has written some really quite amusing verses about animalcular theology and the activities of the early ascidians and mammals on their way to the dignity of the higher ape. So pleasant and ingenious are they that one regrets Mr. Allen's frequent deviations into serious subjects, he might have given us so agreeable a collection of comic verses. Here, for instance, is Mr. Allen at his best, and how entertaining this is! It is called 'The First Idealist':—

A jelly-fish swam in a tropical sea,
And he said, "This world it consists of Me:
There's nothing above and nothing below
That a jelly-fish ever can possibly know
(Since we've got no sight, or hearing, or smell),
Beyond what our single sense can tell.
Now, all that I learn from the sense of touch
Is the fact of my feelings, viewed as such.
But to think they have any external cause
Is an inference clean against logical laws.
Again, to suppose, as I've hitherto done,
There are other jelly-fish under the sun,
Is a pure assumption that can't be backed
By a jot of proof or a single fact.
In short, like Hume, I very much doubt
If there's anything else at all without.
So I come at last to the plain conclusion,
When the subject is fairly set free from confusion,
That the universe simply centres in Me,
And if I were not, then nothing would be."

That minute, a shark, who was strolling by,
Just gulped him down, in the twink of an eye,
And he died, with a few convulsive twists.

But, somehow, the universe still exists.

Of course that is not poetry, exactly, but it is really excellent fooling in verse. When Mr. Allen leaves the "fairy-tales of science" for a serious and fervid proclamation of scientific aspirations and impressions—when he addresses Mr. Herbert Spencer as

Dearest and mightiest of our later seers, Spencer—

then his humour drops off him like a garment, and only the rhetorician is left. When he leaves science altogether, and ventures into politics, singing the glories of Gambetta, and remarking with needless emphasis "A bas la Bourgeoisie!" the rhetorician, though becoming more excited, attains no nearer to the poetic attitude. When neither science nor politics can content the muse of Mr. Allen, and the rhetorician becomes a sentimentalist, weeping effusively in public over the fact that there is a social distinction between women who are virtuous and women who are not virtuous, then we are far indeed from the lively rhymers of the animalcule, and perilously near "the man who was not allowed." There are some poems here which are stated to be the "introduction to a group of poems still mostly unpublished," and Mr. Allen puts forward the fact that they are unpublished rather as if he means that Mrs. Grundy would object to his printing them, as he has so often told us she would object to his bringing out a certain manuscript novel. But there is probably no reason whatever for Mr. Allen to suppose that what he writes and does not publish is so much more naughty than what other people write and do publish. In the present condition of public taste it is possible for a man to publish in England, if not quite everything which it might be profitable for him to write, at all events very nearly everything; and Mr. Allen has given us no reason to suppose that he is capable of writing a new masterpiece of narrative like the memoirs of Casanova, a new masterpiece of sophistical sentiment like Crébillon's 'La Nuit et le Moment,' of cynical psychology like Laclos's 'Les Liaisons Dangereuses.' Nor is it probable that in verse he has gone into rivalry with Straton, or immortalized indignities like Rochester. He appears simply to be hovering feverishly round what is called forbidden fruit, for the sake of the phrase, but which is, after all, quite within easy, comfortable, after-dinner reach of the average man. The relations of the sexes, on which Mr. Allen conceives that he has something perilously new to say, have been the theme of literature since the beginning, and Mr. Allen, with his tremors and his timidities and his juvenile consciousness of the delights of naughtiness, is merely bringing a somewhat misty vision to bear on the most hackneyed of all subjects. Nor is there anything really personal or convincing, any more than there is anything novel, in the poems in the book before us which deal with those relations. The longest of them, 'My Little,' with its Swinburnian echoes, its tawdry pictures of vice, and its hysterical proclamations of mercy, is nothing more than an expansion or dilution of a famous passage in Mr. Lecky. 'Sunday Night at Mabilly' is another preachment on the same text, only it is not an imitation of Mr. Swinburne, but rather of the loosest and latest manner of Browning. All this parade of a sentimental virtue which is on the side of vice through sheer excess of virtue is a little tedious; and there is no excuse for it in beauty of form, or even novelty of presentment. Here is perhaps the best of the poems of this kind:—

PASSIFLORA SANGUINEA.

Aloof she stood beneath the pallid glare
That flashed and flickered through that garish bower;

'She wore a mystic symbol in her hair—
A crimson passion-flower!

What wayward chance allotted unaware
So apt an emblem of the years that lower Above her fateful head, and twisted there
That crimson passion-flower?

Ah, innocent face, the blossom that you bear
Fades in the amorous compass of an hour:
Red stains of martyred blood have flecked so fair
Your crimson passion-flower!

Some Judas kiss betrayed you to despair;
Dead thorns and cankered nails shall be your dower:

And with your own blood's price you bought and wore
That crimson passion-flower.

Now the idea here is, in its way, ingenious, though it is somewhat too violent in emphasis for that "continual slight novelty" to which Aristotle so wisely limited poetic expression. The idea is rhetorical; brought into verse, and made the subject of a poem, it has too much of that epigrammatic ingenuity which is the negation of true poetry. In order to have become poetical it would have needed to be introduced with a certain delicate reserve, an evasive air of the casual; as Heine, for instance, to take a precisely similar instance, has done with his poem on the suicide's flower. This is Heine's method:—

Am Kreuzweg wird begraben,
Wer selber sich brachte um;
Dort wächst eine blasse Blume,
Die Armesünderblum'.

Am Kreuzweg stand ich und seufzte;
Die Nacht war kalt und stumm.
Im Mondschein bewegte sich langsam
Die Armesünderblum'.

Heine does not insist on his image of the flower that grows on the cross-road where the suicide has been buried; he works out no analogy, indulges in no rhetoric, points no moral; he merely tells you that the poor wretch was buried there, and that a blue flower grew out of the grave; that he stood at the cross-road and sighed in the cold and silent night, and that the flower waved slowly in the moonlight. That is all. You may say that it all comes to nothing; you may prove, if you please, that Mr. Allen, with his analogies, and his coloured words, and his sentimental emphasis on the pity of things, has stated his case for the defence far more coherently, has done what ought to be a far more interesting and impressive piece of work. Perhaps so, but then Heine, with his few simple words, his little casual mutation, sends a thrill through all your nerves, touches you to the quick, as only poetry, and the rarest kind of poetry, can do, while Mr. Allen—well, probably Mr. Allen has his admirers, but they will not be admirers of Heine, or of poetry.

Story of the Nations.—Japan. By David Murray, Ph.D., late Adviser to the Japanese Minister of Education. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is, for the most part, a readable although inadequate compilation from the Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, the essays and translations of Mr. Satow, Mr. Aston, and Mr. B. H. Chamberlain, and the usual books on Japan. With these materials and others now accessible a book more worthy of its subject might easily have been produced; but Dr. Murray, who is neither a Japanese scholar nor has for many years been a resident in the country, has made but a poor use of his authorities. His inaccuracies, even when slight in themselves, are just those which no one really qualified to give an adequate account of the most interesting of far-eastern countries could have been guilty of. Thus he calls Admiral Jaurès, "Juares"; Count Poutiatine, "Pontiatine"; Gubbins, "Gubbin," and so forth; and tells us that gawa (river) may, when euphony requires it, be pronounced kawa. The last statement should have been reversed, and an educational adviser should have known that so-called euphonic changes are merely instances of the philological principle of least effort—in plain language, of linguistic laziness. He makes no difference between shin (territories) and koku (countries or provinces), translating the island names Kyūshū and Shikoku as the "Nine Provinces" and the "Four Provinces" respectively.

Of the early history of Japan in particular, which must be regarded mainly as a mere bundle of traditions, Dr. Murray furnishes a most misleading sketch. He admits, indeed, that it is legendary, but although the earliest extant document in Japanese literature—the 'Kojiki,' or 'Notices of Ancient Things,' translated with a learned commentary by Mr. B. H. Chamberlain—dates only from the eighth century of our era, the extraordinary principle is laid down that "it is far more convenient to accept the received Japanese chronology [which starts with the Emperor Jimmu, A.C. 660] in the form it is presented to us [i.e. by the official Japanese writers] and use it as if it were true." This system has the merit of saving trouble, and perhaps of pleasing Dr. Murray's Japanese friends, but it will scarcely be found acceptable by those who prefer historical truth, or at least well-founded hypotheses, to the mere inventions and manipulations of Court scribes and monkish or partisan chroniclers.

Some examples of this uncritical method, taken in the order in which they occur in these pages, we may now adduce, promising that a moderately careful study of the Transactions above mentioned would have obviated most of the numerous errors, of which only a very few can here be noticed. Dr. Murray regards the tsuchi-gumo (earth-spiders) of an interesting and genuine tradition—and very many Japanese traditions have come down to us in a sadly manipulated condition—as pit-dwellers of non-Japanese origin. But the son of Jimmu himself is mentioned as dwelling in a muro or pit, and it is much more probable that the pit-dwellers were also Japanese, possibly of a subordinate tribe. Even the Yezo pit-dwellers (toro-pok-guru) may well have belonged to some Japanese stock. The third chapter opens with the singular statement that the arts of writing and printing were brought to Japan from China in A.D. 284. The truth is that the art of writing was brought, not from China, but from Korea, and certainly not earlier than A.D. 404, when there is reason to believe that a Korean was appointed Chinese tutor to the Prince Imperial. The art of printing was not introduced into Japan until some nine hundred years after the date given by Dr. Murray. A little further on we are told that the "names of these early emperors, &c., must have all been handed down by tradition during almost a thousand years." But the names in question are all posthumous Chinese names. They are not to be found either in the 'Kojiki' or in the 'Nihongi' ('Annals of Japan') compiled a little later, and are inventions of a comparatively quite recent date. They were never, of course, handed down by tradition at all. On p. 52 the invasion of Jimmu's grandfather is treated as an historical fact, and characterized as "no doubt such an expedition as the Norse Vikings of a later day often led into the islands of their neighbours," and again, "as.....a migration of a tribe with all its belongings," &c. What is not mere myth in this statement is the product of Dr. Murray's own imagination. From the reference to the 'Nihon Shoki,' lastly, on p. 121, it may be doubted whether the author is aware that the 'Shoki' and the 'Nihongi' are one and the same work. The citation from the 'Shoki' must in any case be an error, as it refers to an event posterior in date to that at which the annals cease.

Nor has the author at all adequately grasped the true significance of the history of old Japan. He follows too blindly the Japanese system of exalting the Mikado at the expense of the Shogun. But it is most probable that, save for a short period after his emergence from the status of a tribal chief, nothing more than a scintilla of executive power was ever wielded by the Mikado. At first the great Court nobles, afterwards the territorial baronage, governed the country parcel-wise, so to say, and up to 1871 Japan never got beyond the condition of China previous to the consolidation of the old feudal states by Shi Hwangti in the third century B.C. It was only in 1871 that the Mikado became for his subjects, or was even called by them, the Emperor of Japan; to old Japan he was known as the Sublime Porte or the Heaven Ruler (Tennū) only, with no territorial addition whatever, and even within his own palace (at all events, since the rise of the Fujiwara family) enjoyed a mere shadow of authority. What executive power existed was vested in the hands of the Shogun, but the Shogun (to quote the language of the Gorōjiu, or Council of State, in 1862, reported in the Blue-book for 1863) "could not exercise any act directed against the person of the [local] prince or any of his adherents, when within his own domains, even should it become necessary that any arrests should be effected by the agents of the supreme Government." Personally, the Mikado, then, was a nonentity, but the Imperial Majesty sanctioned by religion and tradition was a reality, of which a succession of powerful barons, and finally the Tokugawa Shoguns, made themselves the masters. Without a thorough grasp of this principle—which involved the divorce of position from power, and, applied in various ways, leavened the whole political system—it is impossible to understand the course of the history either of old or of new Japan.

In the account of the assassination of Ii "Kamon-no-Kami"—Dr. Murray's hyphens are entirely unnecessary—the life of that statesman by Shimada Saburo (not to be confounded with Shimadzu Saburo, the old Satsuma daimio) is mentioned in a foot-note, but does not seem to have been consulted. To say that he was appointed regent "on account" of the youth of the Shogun is surely an awkward way of stating that, as the Tokugawa House Law required, he was regent during the prince's legal minority.

The story of the murder of Mr. Richardson, in September, 1862, is incorrect in substance and ungenerous in tone. A rumour is quoted to the effect that Richardson "did ride into Satsuma's train . . . and brought the whole catastrophe upon himself." The present writer was in Japan a few months after the event, and resided there for many years. He never heard of any such report until the later seventies, when an American, a well-known Anglophobe, published a pamphlet on the subject; but he knew well the two Englishmen (now both dead) who accompanied Richardson on that fatal ride, and has often heard them tell the tale. There is not a word of truth in the assertion that the unfortunate victim ever rode into the train. All the evidence that exists is to be found in the Blue-books, and makes it abundantly clear that Richardson was attacked after he had turned back. It might be said that the party should have turned back earlier, but no notice had been given of the passage of a great daimio's train on that day, and the straggling parties the horsemen met with wide intervals between them, common enough on the Tokaidō up to 1869 or 1870, did not necessarily herald the approach of a great feudal baron. Moreover, the mode of attack as detailed in the evidence showed deliberate intention. Satsuma had just been dismissed with contumely from Yedo, and a strong desire to embroil the Shogun with the foreigner had no small share in prompting the murder. Even according to such Japanese law as then existed, Satsuma was wholly in the wrong. He was within the Shogun's peace and was bound to respect the treaties. Foreigners were never expected to dismount and kotos as natives were, and this every Japanese well knew. The Tokaidō was the only road where horse exercise could then be enjoyed; and hundreds of Englishmen have passed hundreds of daimio's trains without any attempt at molestation. Indeed, the murder of Richardson was the only instance of a foreigner being attacked by a daimio's train from the opening of the ports to the abolition of the han or clans.

We have said that the book is readable, and so it is. The illustrations are fairly good, and the portraits of Japanese worthies are especially welcome and interesting. As a contribution to our knowledge of Japan, past or present, its value is not great. We cannot forbear adding that there is now no excuse for a writer on Japanese subjects falling into the sort of errors that disfigure the pages of the volume before us, and, indeed, of most volumes dealing with the ways, old and new, of the people of Dai Nippon.

The Life of Marie Antoinette. By Maxime de la Rocheterie. Translated from the French by Cora Bell. 2 vols. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

A Friend of the Queen (Marie Antoinette—Count de Fersen). From the French of Paul Gault by Mrs. Cashel Hoey. 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

THE same conscientious thoroughness that distinguished M. de la Rocheterie's labours as editor of the Raigecourt and Bombelles correspondence is conspicuous in his biography of Marie Antoinette, a task which is the outcome of fifteen years of research. Without pretension to analytical power or to literary style, he follows the queen's career from her cradle to the grave in a record which is comprehensive, trustworthy, and should attain popularity. The portion which the student will most appreciate is that which expounds the double policy pursued by Marie Antoinette in her communications with foreign powers after the flight to Varennes. Unfortunately much of the value of these volumes is lost by the absence of any foot-notes indicating the numerous and varied authorities out of which the narrative is woven. The index is wretched; the translation indifferent. "Varsovie" has an equivalent in our language. "Complot" is scarcely English. "Petite Trianon" is not French. "Enfant" does not always mean infant, nor "bonté" bounty. "Spectacle" signifies not only a spectacle, but also a theatrical entertainment. We do not like such phrases as "the fine flower of the Revolutionary furia," or "the parties Barrien and Anti-Barrien."

In 1877 Baron R. M. de Klinckowström published in two volumes selections from the journals, papers, and correspondence of his great-uncle Comte de Fersen, the reputed favourite of Marie Antoinette, and one of the most chivalrous defenders of the French Crown, who, after escaping the perils of the Revolution, was fated to be murdered at Stockholm by an infuriated mob. The collection is of considerable interest. But apparently it is not possible for the majority of the French-reading public to digest such a work in its unsophisticated form. A literary cook must intervene who selects appetizing morsels and serves them up anew, smothered in maudlin sentiment, and flavoured with romantic assumptions and scandalous innuendoes.

In the present instance M. Gault, in retracing the life of his hero by the light of the Klinckowström papers, conveys nothing of their intrinsic worth and political importance. In fact, his frontispiece, a clumsy caricature of the portrait of Fersen which adorns the work of the Swedish biographer, is a foretaste of what awaits us. M. Gault's reference to other "documents which he has succeeded in procuring elsewhere" is vague. With one exception we cannot find, either in his record of Fersen or in those discursive details of the French Court which fill the greater portion of his volumes, any fact that has not been already published.

As given in the original, Fersen's slight notes of his grand tour are fairly amusing. That, whilst yet in his teens, he should, after a visit to Voltaire, dwell almost exclusively on the dress worn by the philosopher is excusable. But we lose patience when M. Gault, who abhors "that maker of bad rhymes who wrote 'La Henriade,'" devotes five pages to the eulogy of Fersen's boyish remarks, discovering in them "the complete manifestation of the calm observant mind of the young Swede," who "did not recognize either the writer or the philosopher in the man"—who wore an old wig. Fersen's début at the Court of Versailles, the passion with which he inspired the young queen, afford his biographer still further occasion for twaddle. "We admire," says he, "Titus and Berenice for immolating their love to a policy which prohibited it. Why should we not admire those two, who sacrificed a pure and lofty sentiment to one still higher, and who likewise parted inviatus, invicta?"

Be that as it may, in 1780 Fersen joined the French corps which, under the command of Rochambeau, crossed the Atlantic to aid the revolt of our American colonies. In his letters to his father Fersen tells how for upwards of a twelvemonth the force remained at Newport Island "in shameful inaction," "utterly useless to our allies, a burden rather than a help." "The troops are as undisciplined as the French army generally is. The chiefs very severe, never a day that there are not two or three officers under arrest. I have witnessed disgraceful scenes for which a whole corps ought to have been disbanded, but we cannot afford to lose the men." Neither such descriptions, nor yet Fersen's partiality for the English and his sympathy for Major André, suit M. Gaulot, who is afflicted with Anglophobia. But is he quite correct in stating that André was during eighteen months the intermediary between Clinton and Arnold? The latter had been in disgrace and had resigned his command, receiving moreover a reprimand from Washington, January, 1780. Not till August, 1780, was he appointed to West Point, and on the 23rd of the following month André was captured. It is, at all events, a perversion of fact to affirm that "André got into West Point in the disguise of a peasant."

After the siege of Yorktown all the young colonels of the Court returned to spend the winter in Paris. "Fersen, on the contrary, remained, like the brave and noble soldier that he was; for the courage of a soldier resides in the doing of his duty, whatsoever that may be, without always claiming to be paid in gold or in glory." When, in 1783, he did return to France, "a halo of military gallantry" gave him apparently the power of appropriating, had he so willed it, anybody else's individuality. "What prevented Fersen," asks his eulogist, "from becoming a Richelieu, a Lauzun, a Tilly? Nothing if not himself; he preferred to remain Fersen." Thus much confusion was avoided.

Equally weak and unsatisfactory is M. Gaulot's treatment of the oft-told story of the last years of the French Court. For instance, Pitt's alleged offer for the hand of Mlle. Necker, which Lord Stanhope long ago characterized as a "mere silly rumour," is here resuscitated and amplified as an undoubted fact. On the lady herself all manner of contumely is heaped: the worst construction is placed on her connexion with Narbonne, whilst not only are her courageous exertions to help the fugitive "suspects" ignored, but also the scheme by which in the summer of 1792 she proposed to effect the escape of the royal family. M. Gaulot chooses to forget that many of Corinne's contemporaries were interested in vilifying her. Marie Antoinette held Madame de Staël in detestation, and Fersen followed the royal lady's example, moved, moreover, by official jealousy; for while M. de Staël was the accredited ambassador from Sweden, Fersen, colonel of a French regiment and recipient of a pension from the French Government, was employed by Gustavus III. as his secret and subsidiary agent, we dare not say spy, at Versailles. Again, the account of the flight to Varonnes is marred by the enumeration of Fersen amongst those who for complicity in that attempt "were sent to the prison at Orleans, and afterwards brought before the tribunal of that city."

When in the autumn of 1791—irritated by Louis XVI.'s acceptance of the Constitution, by Marie Antoinette's alliance with Barnave, and by the report that she was sending letter after letter to the Emperor to prevent him from acting—Gustavus III. demanded through Fersen an explanation of her conduct, M. Gaulot accepts as genuine her pretext that her handwriting had been forged. He observes that "diplomats will stick at nothing," and continues to rail against the inaction of Leopold, "the accursed Florentine." However, the queen's reply was evidently a subterfuge. Ambiguous and variable as was her policy, her well-founded distrust of the king's brothers never wavered: anything was preferable to their intervention, to their supremacy. The king, by consenting to the destruction of the monarchy, had proved himself to be a captive; therefore, writes Stodnick, the powers could not treat with him, and held that the only free agents or representatives of the French sovereignty were the émigré princes. Against the ascendancy of these, against their retrograde opinions and their foreign supporters, Marie Antoinette boldly staked the new régime and her new constitutional allies. Were any act hostile to the nation's will to be traced to her, it would be fatal to her game. Hence, to use M. de la Rocheterie's words, "What the king and queen desired above all, what they requested with the greatest energy, was that their partisans should not use force."

Would we know to what extent the queen's liberal policy was genuine, we have only to turn to the correspondence between her and Fersen a month after the acceptance of the Constitution. In his perplexity he asks: "1st. Do you intend to place yourself sincerely on the side of the Revolution; and do you believe that there is no other resource? 2nd. Do you wish to be aided, or do you wish that all negotiations with the courts be discontinued? 3rd. Have you a plan, and what is it?" "Be undisturbed," was the reply, "I shall never go over to the enragés. I am obliged to make use of them to prevent greater evils." Her plan to which she constantly reverted—an armed congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, "which the king would not appear to have provoked," and terrified by which the French would throw themselves into the arms of Louis XVI., begging him to be the mediator between his people and the powers—was but a melodramatic scheme to keep the powers practically inactive while she tested her manœuvre. "Do you comprehend," she wrote to Fersen, "my position and the part I am obliged to play all day? Sometimes I do not understand myself, and am obliged to reflect to make sure that it is indeed I who speak." The result of her rôle appeared in the king's lament, "I was abandoned by every one."

With the advance of the winter of 1791-2 the growing implacability of the Jacobins became unmistakable. Making from Brussels a brief and venturesome visit to Paris in February, 1792, Fersen, perceiving the desperate position of the royal family, vainly strove to induce the king to seek once more in flight the only chance of safety left. At the same time the queen, confessing to Mercy "that no help could be expected from time or from interior efforts," threw off her democratic disguise and avowed that save by foreign troops and foreign assistance the king's authority could not be re-established. By turns she upbraided with indifference to her fate Brotauil, Leopold, and Mercy. She urged on the last the desirability of the Emperor fearlessly accepting the war the Assembly was provoking, because "there is no cause for being uneasy about our safety. . . . the existence of the king and that of his son are so necessary to those scoundrels about us that this guarantees our safety." Presently we find her betraying in her secret correspondence with Fersen the military and political plans of the Government of France for the benefit of the invaders (a fact, by the way, which, though in unison with her character, is in singular contrast to the patriotic sentiments, such as "The interest of France before everything," &c., with which a few months later, when a prisoner in the Temple, she sought to imbue M. Huc). In July, '92, in accents of despair, she implored Fersen to hasten the issue of the expected manifesto:—

"Say to M. de Mercy that the lives of the king and queen are in the greatest danger . . . that the manifesto must be sent immediately . . . that it will necessarily rally a large following round the king and place him in safety; that otherwise no one can answer for his security for twenty-four hours."

Her confidant was only too zealous. The text of Mallet du Pan had originally been adopted by the powers. Fersen desired it should be more strongly worded. He was at last able to report: "The declaration of the Duke of Brunswick . . . it is I who have had it made through M. de Limon." It is unnecessary for us to follow the well-known fatal results of this move. In his confession to Prince d'Arenberg, Mercy acknowledged that, "not having believed the murder of the King of France possible, all was not perhaps done which might have been done to prevent this horror." Nevertheless, that old and faithful adviser of Marie Antoinette might well have pleaded that the incredulity in question was due to the queen's own instructions to him, which we have already quoted from Klinckowström. We cannot join in that complete condemnation of Austria in which it suits French historians to indulge.

In editing Fersen's correspondence Baron de Klinckowström indicated by dots suppressed, undeclared, or missing words and paragraphs. "All this would perhaps," says M. Gaulot, "authorize us to supply the missing passages, and would guide us in our suppositions." Hence, whilst authors of historical romance usually take for basis actual facts, writers of so-called history consider themselves at liberty to invent both foundation and superstructure. Though M. Gaulot disclaims any intention of utilizing this liberty, we must strongly condemn the method he has adopted in order to represent his hero as the love-lorn swain of a not too cruel mistress. In March, 1793, General Jarjayes had entered with Toulon into a plan for the escape of the widowed queen. However, she refused to leave her children. Then Jarjayes, fearing arrest, fled, leaving his wife and family in Paris. At the moment of his departure Marie Antoinette addressed to him the following lines:—

"Adieu! je crois que si vous êtes bien décidé à partir, il vaut mieux que ce soit promptement. Mon Dieu! que je plains votre pauvre femme. T. . . . [Toulon] vous dira l'engagement formel que je prends de vous la rendre, si cela n'est possible. Que je serais heureuse si nous pouvions être bientôt tous réunis ! Jamais je ne pourrai assez reconnaître tout ce que vous avez fait pour nous. Adieu ! ce mot est cruel ! — Klinckowstrum, vol. ii. p. 408.

In February, 1794, Jarjays, being still in exile, begged Fersen to interest the Emperor on his behalf, and enclosed in support of his request a copy of the above letter. The incident thus stated is simple and innocent enough—M. Gaulot deliberately perverts it. Not only does he keep back some of the leading facts, but, when quoting the letter, he adroitly suppresses the two sentences referring to Madame de Jarjays and omits the word "tous" in the succeeding phrase, thus leading the unwary reader to believe that the "note" which "Toulain passed on to Jarjays," and of which "a copy exists among Fersen's papers," was actually addressed by the queen to her lover. "In leaving France M. de Jarjays would be able to convey the captive's tender remembrance to Count Fersen." Now, as we have shown, no mention—tender or otherwise—appears of the Swede in the queen's note, of which a copy only fell into his hands ultimately by an unforeseen course of events.

The story of "the Stamp" is new to us. While we inquire if "the Stamp" ever existed, M. Gaulot asks, "What was it?" and demands if the inheritors of the Fersen papers can answer that question; or did the Count hope "by destroying" the Stamp "to conceal the secret of two hearts for ever"? If so, he evidently did not foresee the omniscience of M. Gaulot's "Private Inquiry Office."

Whilst abusing our gold-loving nation M. Gaulot should remember that Marie Antoinette could number among the friends of her darkest hours Col. Quintin Craufurd, who, though bound to her cause by no tie of duty, patriotism, self-interest, or passion, imperilled his life again and again in the attempt to rescue the royal family. Nor should Mrs. Sullivan be forgotten, questionable though her position may have been; nor yet the mysterious and perhaps equally questionable confidante of Comte Louis de Frotté, Mrs. Atkins (or Atkyns), of Ketteringham Hall, who sometimes figures as Duchesse of Ketteringham, and who is said to have made her way into the Conciergerie with the intention of changing clothes with, and taking the place of, the captive queen.

By the way, a practised translator like Mrs. Cashol Hoey should not have made Gustavus III. describe a fête "as fairly land, a spectacle worthy of the Champs Elysées." She has surely heard of the Elysian Fields.

"Junius" Revealed. By his Surviving Grandson H. R. Francis. (Longmans & Co.)

(Second Notice.)

It is maintained, however, that Francis once wrote a date which serves as a clue to connect him with Junius. This alleged fact impressed Mr. Twleton, and Mr. Francis recurs to the point after having written that his grandfather's "authorship of the Letters has been distinctly demonstrated." In the Athenæum for August 25th, 1888, this matter is dealt with, and reasons are given for rejecting the conclusion at which Mr. Chabot and Mr. Twleton had arrived, which now commends itself to Mr. Francis. When Junius corrected the proof-sheets of his 'Letters,' he made several changes in the text, and he altered some of the dates at the top of some of them. It was the custom of Francis to place a full stop after the month, day of the month, and the year. At the top of one of the Junian letters there appears "29 July 1769," while the corresponding date is found in one of Francis's private letters. In Francis's letter the date clearly appears as follows: "29. July. 1769." On the proof-sheet it is in this form: "29—July—1769," and this is styled an absolute similarity! The assumption is that Junius, being Francis, forgot to write in his feigned hand when he inserted the date. But Woodfall would have noticed this, had the fact been as is supposed, and he would have been as greatly impressed as any subsequent discoverer has been. The simple explanation is that Woodfall inserted the date, which is in his handwriting, and that Junius, seeing that it was correct, did not erase it, as he did in the case of others which were wrong. The matter is trivial, yet it has been first misunderstood, and then misrepresented to uphold the assumption that Francis was Junius.

The following remarks by Mr. Francis, when examined, do not help his case:—

"To speak broadly, Junius and Francis admire the same people, support the same people; have the same lofty angers, the same petty resentments; pursue the same political objects, and are encouraged or depressed by the same political changes."

Now let us see how this assertion tallies with authentic facts. Sir William Draper was one of the earliest objects of the invective of Junius: he was a friend of Dr. Francis and his son, and he was referred to in Parliament by Philip Francis as one whose opinion he valued on a point of honour. Junius was a warm supporter of George Grenville; but, as was pointed out in 1825 by Sir James Mackintosh, Francis intimated his strong disapproval of Grenville's American policy. The Duke of Bedford was attacked by Junius in scandalous terms; all that is known of Francis in connexion with the Bedford family is that he wrote to his wife from Derby on July 30th, 1771, and said, "The Duchess of Bedford, and be d—d to her, would not let us see Wooburn Abbey, which we all greatly regret." John Calcraft obtained for Francis the first appointment which he had in the Government service; he was his intimate friend and frequent host during life, and at death left orders that Francis should be returned for Wareham, his (Calfcraft's) pocket borough, bequeathing to him 1,000*l.* by way of legacy, and providing an annuity for Mrs. Francis of 300*l.* during her widowhood, should her husband not leave her 300*l.* a year. Junius wrote of this munificent benefactor to Francis: "Even the silent vote of Mr. Calcraft is worth reckoning in a division. What though he revels in the plunder of the army, and only determined to be a patriot when he could not be a peer?" The Earl of Chatham, according to Junius, was "a lunatic brandishing a crutch"; Francis informed the House of Commons that he was the debtor to Chatham for favours in early life, and that when Chatham died he did not leave his equal behind him. Welbore Ellis appointed Francis first clerk in the War Office; Junius wrote of him as "little mannikin Ellis," who was "the most contemptible piece of machinery in the kingdom." On March 22nd, 1772, Junius wrote to Woodfall as follows:—

"I desire you will inform the public that the worthy Lord Barrington, not contented with having driven Mr. D'Oyly out of the War Office, has at last contrived to expel Mr. Francis.....Men who do their duty with credit and ability are not proper instruments for Lord Barrington to work with."

On December 22nd, 1771, D'Oyly wrote to Francis that he had desired and received Lord Barrington's permission to retire from the War Office. Francis wrote on the 24th of January, 1772, that D'Oyly had resigned his appointment, and that the offer of his place had been made to him by Lord Barrington, and declined for "solid reasons." He said in another letter, dated two days before Junius wrote about Francis being expelled from the War Office, "I leave the War Office. It is my own act. Be not alarmed for me. Everything is secure and as it should be." Lord Barrington was not only the official superior, but the friend of Francis. The latter owed to him his nomination as member of the Council of Bengal. When Barrington quitted his post he wrote to Francis stating his reasons, and he did so "thinking, from your long friendship for me, that it would be acceptable to you." Of this invaluable and warm friend, to whom Francis paid his first visit after returning from India, Junius wrote to Woodfall: "Having nothing better to do, I propose to entertain myself and the public with torturing that bloody wretch Barrington"; again, "Next to the Duke of Grafton, I verily believe that the blackest heart in the kingdom belongs to Lord Barrington." Those who read the foregoing extracts will not admit, we should think, that Junius and Philip Francis "admire the same people, attack the same people, support the same people." Mr. Francis says that he has been "a travelling judge at the Antipodes," and it may be he has not had the leisure to collect all the facts. If they were placed before him, he might as a judge be more chary than he is as an author in affirming the identity of Junius with his grandfather. The Lord Chief Justice said in a letter which appeared in the Athenæum for the 9th of July, 1892:—

"If Francis really were Junius, a scoundrel he was of the deepest dye; and, indeed, no one who knows what Junius wrote, and what Francis wrote under his own name, will hesitate to say so.....I read and admired Junius as a very young man. I have often read him since, and I still admire him very much. Always assuming him not to be Francis, I think better of him than is the fashion, and I believe him to have been honest and a patriot."

Lord Coleridge adds: "I have no affirmative theory of my own." Many years ago it was written in these columns that on this subject "the Athenæum has no theories." In rejecting as pure fiction what Mr. Francis has written about his grandfather, we do so on purely critical grounds, and for reasons which we hold to be logical. Mr. Francis says that his father, while having no doubt as to the authorship of the Letters, "spoke of it rarely and with bated breath, as by no means a subject for unmixed pride, but rather one to be kept in the background." His father was right in thinking the family discredited if Sir Philip Francis had been Junius.

Milton's Prosody: an Examination of the Rules of the Blank Verse in Milton's Later Poems, with an Account of the Versification of 'Samson Agonistes,' and General Notes. By Robert Bridges. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

It has been contended that between the time when those Victorian poets whom it was once the fashion to call the Pro-Raphaelites were prominently in evidence, and the present moment, Mr. Robert Bridges takes, in point both of original endowment and of culture, the first place. We are not going to challenge the contention. What concerns us here is that he seems to have paid that careful attention to English prosody, and especially to the prosody of Milton, which is indispensable to the equipment of the true poetic artist. But before entering upon the general questions he raises respecting the growth of Milton's metrical methods, it seems necessary that we should say a word or two upon the terminology he adopts. He is, as we have said, an accomplished scholar as well as a poet, but he forgets what a scholar should never forget—that in literary criticism, as in philosophical discussion, one of the most important things to learn is that no terminology, however ingenious, can really cover ideas—that no words, however carefully chosen, can ever do more than indicate feebly distinctions of thought:—

For words, like nature, half reveal
And half conceal the soul within.

Indeed, the relation between ideas and the terminology that would express them reminds the reader perpetually of Sir William Temple's comparison of human life to a blanket too small for the bed. By attempting to cover fully the thought with the verbal expression, the thinker is generally compelled to pull the covering over one side of the bed and leave the other side bare.

Hence one of the signs of a real thinker, as contrasted with a manipulator of worn-out thoughts, is his reluctance to invent a new and unfamiliar terminology, when, perhaps, an old and familiar one can, in spite of its imperfections, do the work. It is in the skill with which he makes use of the terminology which has won acceptance that the true scholar shows his equipment for the work of exposition. No one supposes that the prosodian, when analyzing English verse, uses the Greek terminology in ignorance of the fundamental difference between an accentual and a quantitative scansion. But as has often been reiterated in these columns, it is too late nowadays to try to replace that Greek terminology which has been good enough not only for the accomplished critics of the eighteenth century, but for those of the nineteenth, from Coleridge downwards, by any other system, however accurate from the scholastic point of view.

We do not believe, however, that by the use of a terminology which has been for so many generations accepted, any confusion arises in the mind of the reader as to the relations between quantitative and accentual measures. It is perfectly understood, even by readers who have but a slight knowledge of classical poetry, that while in a Greek iambic foot the second syllable is heavily weighted with quantity, no matter where the accent may fall, in an English iambic foot, on the contrary, the second syllable is heavily weighted with accent, no matter where the quantity may lie, and that a trochee is but an iamb reversed. Of course, a new terminology more in consonance with the true nature of English prosody would be desirable; but as nothing in criticism is so difficult as to substitute a new terminology for an old one, our best critics have avoided making the attempt. By using the phrase "rising rhythm" to denote an iamb, and the phrase "falling rhythm" to denote a trochee, by substituting the word "stress" for the word "accent," or the word "break" for the word "pause," as Mr. Bridges does, an air of pedantry is thrown over his treatise, and we cannot see what gain in perspicuity is secured. With regard to the use of the word "caesura" in criticizing English poetry, there is no doubt an objection of a real kind; for while in classic scansion it means something fixed, in English scansion it means something variable. But the words "main pause," which in these columns we always use, are better than the word "break," because they are more familiar. These objections apart, we have nothing but praise for this work.

In the first part of the essay Mr. Bridges classifies and elaborates with extraordinary care and insight the details of Milton's metrical effects in 'Paradise Lost,' such as his use of extra-metrical syllables, his use of the elisions of common speech and of poetic elisions, his use of the contractions of common speech and of poetical contractions, his occasional and most happy substitution of the trochee for the iamb in all the various parts of the line, his varying use of the pause, &c. And then, having formulated the principles which guided Milton, the critic compares and contrasts these with the principles which guided the poet when he wrote 'Paradise Regained' and 'Samson Agonistes.' The most noticeable change apparent in Milton's methods is connected with elision. In his later poems he gave himself a freedom of elision of which no trace is seen in 'Paradise Lost.' Does or does not that freedom pass sometimes into a lawlessness comparable with that of some of the Shakespearian dramatists?—

"There are altogether only about a score of exceptions to the old rules: so that they would seem to indicate a cession of principle rather than a change of practice, if it were not for the rarity in all good verse of such examples as here present themselves. None of the following lines would have been admitted into 'Paradise Lost':"

- (1) The worst of all indignities yet on me. S.A. 1341.
- (2) The rest was magnanimity to remit. 1470.
- (3) And he in that calamitous prison left. 1480.
- (4) Thy polite maxims or that cumbersome. P.R. III 400.
- (5) With youthful courage and magnanimous thoughts. S.A. 524.
- (6) Bhr's gune, a manifest serpent by her sting. 907.
- (7) But providence or instinct of nature seems. 1545.
- (8) And all the flourishing works of peace destroy. P.R. III 89.
- (9) Wile thou, then, serve the Philistines with that gift. S.A. 677.

- (10) Soaked in his enemies blood; and from the stream. 1738.
- (11) Present in temples at idolatrous rites. 1378.
- (12) Drunk with idolatry, drunk with wine. 1870.
- (13) The close of all my miseries and the balm. 651.

Of the above, the first four examples are all of them instances of short i being admitted into the fiction of elision before t, as in the word capital, which was the only exception in 'Paradise Lost' (...and note also that the word spirit ...might be reckoned in this class of words): and capital itself occurs contracted again in 'Samson,' lines 394 and 1235."

Among contemporary poets it is astonishing how little is understood of the principles of elision, save by Mr. Swinburne, who is at once the greatest metricist and the most learned poet that has appeared in England since Milton. The same poet will in the same sequence try to elide a letter which cannot be elided, and leave a hideous hiatus where elision is a manifest necessity, showing himself to be working in entire ignorance of the meaning and function of elision. In such a phrase as this of Milton's—

All in a moment through the gloom were seen
Ten thousand banners rise into the air
With orient colours waving—

it must not be supposed that the elision in the last hemistich is a merely allowable licence which the poet could adopt or reject as he might choose; it is a metrical necessity. Moreover, the liquid turn of the word "orient" flashes upon the mental eye of the reader the very movement of the banners as they float in the air. That after such a master of elision as Milton poets (and fine poets) should have followed to whom elision is an unknown art is a curious fact in the history of our poetry.

And this leads us to remark that it is not in tables showing Milton's various ways of eliding liquids and vowels, his various ways of achieving recession of accent, or of substituting in a line one foot for another, that his amazing mastery over metrical music is to be understood. In this opinion no one will, we are sure, more heartily agree with us than Mr. Bridges. In poetry, as in the other arts, it is the power of fusing the artistic material which enables the artist to lend his work the true artistic life. It was by the fusion of a few simple elements that the great artist Nature moulded a universe whose principle of life is beauty. In the art of man is it not the same? What is it that makes a comparatively few poems really live, while the great mass of poetic material produced in all ages and in all literatures perishes? It is the quality of fusion. There is in the rugged unfused work of Donne poetic material in sufficient quality and quantity to make three or four such poets as the writer of the 'Polyolbion,' and yet by the power of fusion shown in one famous sonnet Drayton escapes that oblivion which without it would assuredly have been his. In Dobell's 'Balder' there is enough material to make several poets of the calibre of Edgar Poe; but while 'Balder' is forgotten, the 'Raven' may certainly be named as one among the poems of the nineteenth century that will be remembered in the twentieth. And how is its immortality secured? By fusion. The entire poem reads like one sentence.

The quality we speak of may be the result of manipulation, as in the case of Rossetti's 'Sister Helen,' or it may be the result of the poem's having become slowly fused in the minds of generations of reciters, as in the case of the best Border ballads; but always its saving power is one and the same. With fusion the poem lives, without fusion the poem perishes. To fuse the fourteen lines of a sonnet so that a reader having read the first line demands eagerly, he knows not why, the second, and having read the second line demands eagerly, he knows not why, the third, may be no very great achievement. But to secure the same triumph in composing the first book of 'Paradise Lost' or the twenty-fourth Iliad is a power given only to the highest genius. For it is in continuity of force that the human mind fails. So deficient in this power of fusion are most English poets that nothing is more common than to see in a short blank-verse sequence three or four repetitions of the third-foot pause, and in a short rhymed sequence two or three repetitions of the same rhyme. Poetry is the only art in which such barbarism is tolerated. In music no writer, even of the second class, would dare to ignore fusion. And the same may be said of painting, sculpture, and architecture. Now among the writers of English blank verse Milton at one period of his life had the greatest command of fusion—the greatest command over metrical music in all its forms. All the sacred secrets of poetic art, the knowledge of which is the poet's greatest bliss, were his.

There are poets who excel in melody and there are poets who excel in harmony, but in both melody and harmony Milton, at the period we allude to, became the suzerain over all the kings of English song. Although in melodic sweetness such phrases as

Anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders surpass the music of all other writers of English blank verse, yet the harmony of the sequence in which these lines move—the triumphant harmony, rolling on and on like the mysterious and contrapuntal music struck by the wind from the sea—is in no way disturbed, in no way slackened or made languid, by the ravishing melody of the parts. And when did this mastery over English blank verse come to him? It came with the writing of 'Paradise Lost.' In other words, Milton (after having shown only a moderate power of musical fusion in 'Comus' and the other work of his youth—a power not equalling Fletcher's—and after having forty-two years ceased to produce poetry save in the form of a few sonnets, the best of which actually gives 'o' as the rhyme-vowel in eleven lines out of fourteen) became, when his blindness set in, the greatest master of fusion in our literature—a fusion which manifests itself not only in the arrangement of the pauses, but in command over all the resources of the poetic artist—over elision no less than over assonance, over alliteration no less than over the arrangement of the liquids and vowel composition. Before this period his indebtedness to Fletcher in the matter of rhyme-music is not more apparent in 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penseroso' than is his indebtedness in 'Comus' to the same master for the music of blank verse. And what are we to infer from this fact that it was not until his blindness that the true Miltonic music began? Here is an interesting question indeed. So inextricably interwoven are the mental processes with the processes of the physical organism of man that to inquire into the connexion between Milton's blindness and his mastery over fusion would seem to be the first duty of the critic of 'Paradise Lost.' And yet critics so well equipped as Lander and De Quincey have left this question untouched. Did it not occur to them that when a poet has to know his work by heart, as Milton had to know his, the movement of all the genial forces, mental and physical, during the act of composition must be extremely unlike the movement of these forces when the ideas and emotions are fastened in the arbitrary and fixed symbols of written speech? Did it not occur to them that between verse composed for both the eye and the ear, and verse composed for the ear alone, there must be this difference, that while in the former case harmonious fusion of music is, no doubt, the crowning grace, in the latter case fusion of music is a necessity; that without it the poet's memory could scarcely work at all? In order that the poet's mind may hold and recall without the aid of writing any sequence or group of sequences, it must grasp the entire mass, not only of the ideas of the sequence, but of its words, and further must grasp them as fixed into some rhythmic movement.

That a poet whose lines are written for both eye and ear is liable to have this fusion disturbed by the too active invasion of the suggestions of the other senses is seen in the case of a poet who, though a lyrist, might in this respect be usefully compared with Milton—a poet who, had he been blind, would have shown as great a mastery over musical fusion as he shows over lyric energy and sweeping impetuosity of flight.

Mente decurrens velut annis, imbroque
Quem super notas alucere ripas,
Fervet immensusque ruit profundo
Pindarus ore.

It is by association that the genial forces of the poet move: as closely as the atoms of the physical world cluster around each other do ideas and the words that embody them cluster around each other in the mind of man. And Pindar's great odes show a fusion of music from the contrapuntal point of view which, had it not been disturbed by the rush of imported ideas suggested by mental association, might, as regards the blending of apparently discordant musical elements, have equalled that of Milton in 'Samson Agonistes.'

The legend that the Iliad was the work of a blind poet may be nothing more than a legend. But in the twenty-fourth Iliad, ravishingly sweet as are the individual verses, their sweetness does not in any way make languid the harmony of the whole. But even the mastery over fusion in the twenty-fourth Iliad is not so wonderful as is Milton's mastery over this crowning artistic effect after his blindness set in. With regard to 'Paradise Lost' this criticism is not likely to be challenged. But what about 'Samson Agonistes,' with its truncated lines, its introduction of spondee and dactyle and trochees in every part of the lines, whether they be lyrical lines delivered by the chorus or lines of dramatic dialogue? Is the same musical fusion apparent there? Yes, indeed, and more apparent there, if possible, than even in 'Paradise Lost.' On this point we fully agree with Mr. Bridges:—

"It is not less than an absurdity to suppose that Milton's carefully-made verse could be unmusical: on the other hand it is easy to see how the far-sought effects of the greatest master in any art may lie beyond the general taste. In rhythm this is specially the case; while almost everybody has a natural liking for the common fundamental rhythms, it is only after long familiarity with them that the ear grows dissatisfied, and wishes them to be broken; and there are very few persons indeed who take such a natural delight in rhythm for its own sake, that they can follow with pleasure a learned rhythm which is very rich in variety, and the beauty of which is its perpetual freedom to obey the sense and diction. And this also is true, that some knowledge of the structure, or laws which govern such rhythms is necessary to most persons before they will receive them as melodious; and they will accept or reject a rhythm to which they are unaccustomed, according as they can or cannot perceive, or think they perceive, its structure."

The student may soon understand the nature of the new kind of fusion in 'Samson Agonistes' if he will only take the trouble to put himself in Milton's place and learn the poem by heart so as to be able to recall it with closed eyes. And here let us say once for all that the student of Milton who will not take the trouble to learn him by heart is no worthy critic of the master of masters. If the student will do this, he will understand how Matthew Arnold failed in his attempt to write irregular blank-verse lines like Milton, and how others in our own day have failed to write irregular blank-verse lines like Matthew Arnold. Milton knew what he was about; Matthew Arnold and those who followed him did not. When Milton set out in 'Samson Agonistes' to construct rhymeless iambic lines that should not be decasyllabic, it was not because he laboured under any such misconceptions about the nature of English blank verse and its origin as that which is apparent in the work of the metrical innovators of our own time.

In poetic art there was nothing that Milton did not know and know thoroughly. Although he knew that the writers of 'Gorboduc' gave us merely a ten-syllable iambic line with the rhymes knocked off, he did not come to the conclusion, as the modern writers of irregular blank verse have done, that it was an accident which thus gave us the prescribed length of the normal blank-verse line. He did not suppose, as they suppose, that any other measure—the iambic of eight syllables, for instance—might, but for an accident, have been the basis of the English blank-verse measure. No one was better acquainted with the history of the growth of English measures than he. He could turn to the period when the romance measures of the Continent were popularized by Chaucer, when the alliterative measures of early English poetry were superseded by rhymed iambic lines, and then he could turn to 'Gorboduc,' to Peele, to Marlowe, to Shakespeare. He saw how Chaucer came to the conclusion that the great, the sonorous, the heroic line of English poetry must, from the very genius of the language, be one of five feet, as being, indeed, the longest possible English line. For the alexandrine is not one line, but two, whether the pause falls upon the third foot, as it generally does in Spenser's 'Faerie Queene,' or upon the fourth foot, as it often does in Milton's 'Ode to the Nativity.' And he felt that there could be no irregular blank verse save as variations—variations of some recognized type or standard governed by the law of the regular blank verse in which the poem was constructed.

Surely it was not an accident, surely it was inevitable, that when a rhymeless heroic line was invented, its basis should be the iambic line of ten syllables with the rhymes knocked off, and that this should be the basis of all blank verse. What made the versification of 'Gorboduc,' and, indeed, of all blank-verse poems until Peele and afterwards Marlowe wrote, so monotonous and unsatisfactory, was this, that Sackville, Norton, and the rest never learned that English blank verse is governed only by variation of pause in relation not only to the sequence, but to a typical decasyllabic line.

Pause the rudder is of verses

By which, like ships, they steer their courses.

They never discovered that just as the rudder in early English poetry had consisted of alliterative bars until it was superseded by the new rudder of rhyme brought in by the romance measures, so a still newer rudder was needed in a measure that pretended to dispense with both alliterative bars and rhyme. This rudder was variation of pause in regard to a sequence of ten-syllable iambic lines—that is to say, lines in which the most common and most easily adjusted pause was on the second foot, and the most powerful pause on the third foot. The importance of writing a blank-verse poem in decasyllabic lines is seen in that very quotation from 'Paradise Lost' which Mr. Bridges gives in illustration of a different principle altogether; but, by turning shadiest into "shady," he plays havoc with one of Milton's fine effects of combined elision and alliteration:—

Then feed on thoughts that voluntary move
Harmonious numbers; as the wakeful bird
Sings dawning, and in shadiest covert hid,
Tunes her nocturnal note. Thus with the year Seasons return; but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine.

Here we see that the enormous emphasis thrown upon the word "seasons" and the word "day" is caused not merely by the place they fill in the sequence, apart from line arrangement, but also by the fact that the ear, accustomed to the decasyllabic arrangement of the lines, welcomes the variation afforded by the initial trochee. You can only get variation by having first a type from which to depart when the artistic occasion arises to assert itself. Our modern innovators, having no decasyllabic or other type from which to depart, seem to leave the arrangement of the lines to the compositor. Whether the lines end with words of power, or with adjectives, or with particles seems entirely a matter of chance. Let us suppose one of our contemporary poets setting out to improve this passage in irregular blank verse after the approved principle. Is not this the kind of verse he would most likely produce?—

Then feed on thoughts that Voluntary move harmonious numbers;
As the wakeful bird sings dawning, and in shadiest
Covert hid, tunes her nocturnal note.
Thus with the year seasons
Return; but not to me returns day, or the sweet
Approach of even or morn, or sight
Of vernal bloom, or summer's rose, or flocks,
Or herds, or human face divine.

Very different from all such lawless excursions in irregular blank verse is the metrical system of 'Samson Agonistes,' where the basis of the structure is the decasyllabic line and the variations are governed entirely by the emotions. But in truth a volume might be written upon the irregular blank verse of 'Samson Agonistes,' and no one could do it so well as Mr. Bridges.

THE LITERATURE OF FOLK-LORE.

Folk-lore of Scottish Lochs and Springs. By James M. Mackinlay. (Glasgow, Hodge & Co.)—It is well known that our remote forefathers deified water (as, indeed, they deified all nature) and that savages still revere it as a god, but few realize how many fragments of the rites of this worship still survive and how tenaciously they are clung to. Let all who want to know where holy wells, healing wells, wishing wells, sacred streams, &c., are to be found, consult this book. Mr. Mackinlay has, indeed, collected a surprisingly large number of instances of picturesque survivals of ancient rites of all kinds, and has given a careful account of many more which to our infinite regret have disappeared. One of these he quotes from Martin, who visited the western islands of Scotland about two hundred years ago:—

"A custom connected with ancient sea-worship had been popular among the inhabitants of Lewis till about thirty years before his visit, but had been suppressed by the Protestant clergy on account of its pagan character. This was an annual sacrifice at Hallow-tide to a sea god called Shony. Martin gives the following account of the ceremony: 'The inhabitants round the island came to the church of St. Mulvey, having each man his provision along with him; every family furnished a peck of malt, and this was brewed into ale; one of their number was picked out to wade into the sea up to the middle, and, carrying a cup of ale in his hand, standing still in that posture, cried out with a loud voice, saying, 'Shony, I give you this cup of ale, hoping that you'll be so kind as to send us plenty of sea-ware for enriching our ground the ensuing year,' and so threw the cup into the sea. This was performed in the night-time."

"Sea-ware" is good, though perhaps a trifle too like what railway porters during the August rush to the sea describe as Whithy or Scarborough "stuff." "Shony" has disappeared, but mermaids have been seen in Orkney more than once during the last year; and if Hugh Miller had not a bowing acquaintance with one himself, he knew persons who had. Their existence is, however, protected by the belief that it is dangerous to wound a mermaid, even when she appears in the form of a seal only; and cases are reported when, one having been shot under this condition, a terrific tempest arose as soon as her blood mingled with the sea. According to Mr. Mackinlay, belief in water horses and bulls, if extinct now, was alive as recently as about the year 1840, for, quoting from Dixon's 'Gairloch,' he describes an attempt to destroy the famous water cow which made its home in Loch-na-Beiste:—

"The proprietor tried to drain the loch, which, except at one point, is little more than a fathom in depth; when his efforts failed he threw a quantity of quicklime into the water to poison the monster. It was described by two men who saw it as in appearance like 'a good-sized boat with the keel turned up.'"

The description carries a large amount of conviction with it. Consecrated fish seem to have abounded in Scotland. Loch Siant was filled with trout, but none dared to kill them. Martin

"saw a little well in Kilbride, in the south of Skye, with one Trout only in it; the natives are very tender of it, and though they often chance to catch it in their wooden pails, they are very careful to preserve it from being destroyed; it has been there for many years."

Holy fishes, however, sometimes inhabited holy wells in pairs, but never varied in size, colour, or number. Few were so accommodating as the pair which lived in the Well of St. Neot, in Cornwall (Mr. Mackinlay allows himself frequently to stray across the Border):—

"These fish were always two in number. Day by day, the saint had one for dinner, and its place was miraculously supplied to keep up the proper number. One day he fell sick, and his servant, contrary to all ascetic precedent, cooked both and set them before his master. The saint was horrified, and had both the fish—cooked though they were—put back into the spring. He sought forgiveness for the rash act, and lo! the fish became alive once more; and as a further sign that the sacrilege was condoned, St. Neot, on eating his usual daily portion, was at once restored to health."

Much the most picturesque bit of sorcery that Mr. Mackinlay names—it is not new to us, though—is one which he says was practised in the counties of Sutherland and Ross until the last few years:—

"When any one wished evil to another he made a clay image of the person to be injured, and placed it in a stream with the head of the image against the current. It was believed that, as the clay was dissolved by the water, the health of the person represented would decline. The spell, however, would be broken if the image was discovered and removed from the stream."

This is the wax image of richer folks, and another element is called in to aid in the work of slow destruction. Water, however, could do good as well as evil, and many are the springs and wells and streams that Mr. Mackinlay describes as gifted with power of healing. Water from what he speaks of as "a dead and living ford," i. e., a ford across which the dead were carried and the living walked, was more potent than any doctor, and so was the water of a south-running stream, but to this it was not absolutely necessary that the patient should go himself—it might be brought to him in much the same manner as Mr. Mackinlay says water was brought from the Dow (Dhu) Loch:—

"When a deputy was sent, he had to bring a portion of the invalid's clothing and throw it over his left shoulder into the loch. He then took up some water in a vessel which he carefully kept from touching the ground. After turning himself round sun-ways he carried the water home. The charm would be broken if he looked back or spoke to any one by the way. Among the people of the district it was a common saying, when any one did not respond to the greeting of a passer-by, that he had been at the Dow Loch."

Mr. Mackinlay omits to say that in Scotland this sovereign remedy is generally called "Unspoken Water." Belief in "Unspoken Water" and healing wells, if extinct now, was in full force not many years ago, and the author of 'Tales from the Western Highlands' said, "Holy healing wells are common all over the Highlands, and people still leave offerings of pins and nails and bits of rag, though few would confess it." A holy healing well in ancient times must have been anything but pretty to look at, for every tree and bush near it was hung with rags of the clothing of sick persons. The more worn and ragged these torn-off fragments of raiment were, the better, perhaps, for the sick folk, for as these rags wore away their illnesses were supposed to disappear. When the sufferer went in person, which he, of course, had to do when immersion formed part of the ceremony, we think it more than probable that he himself came to an end much more quickly than the rag of his clothing, for the time selected for immersion was usually either just after sunset or just before sunrise, and patients were often brought from great distances. In his description of three wells near St. Medan's Chapel, Wigtonshire, Mr. Mackinlay quotes an account of the ceremonies in use when the saint's aid was sought in behalf of a sick child. This account was given to Dr. Robert Trotter by an eye-witness. "The child was stripped naked," before sunrise on the first Sunday in May.

"and taken by the spaul—that is, by one of the legs—and plunged head foremost into the big well till completely submerged; it was then pulled out, and the part held on by was dipped in the middle well, and then the whole body was finished by washing the eyes in the smallest one."

Faith must have been strong there, and stronger still in Glendochart, in which district was St. Fillan's Holy Pool (Scott calls it well, but he wished it to rhyme with "dispel"). In reality, it was a pool in the river Fillan.

"Towards the end of last century, as many as two hundred persons were brought annually to the spot. The time selected was usually the first day of the quarter (Q.S.), and immersion took place after sunset. The patients, with a rope tied round their waist, were thrown from the bank into the river. This was usually done thrice. According to previous instructions, they picked up nine stones from the bottom of the stream. After their dip they walked three times round three cairns in the immediate neighbourhood, and at each turn added a stone to the cairn. After the ceremony the patient was led to the ruins of St. Fillan's chapel, about half a mile away, and there tied to a stone with a hollow in it, large enough to receive the body, the unfortunate person being fastened down to a wooden framework. The patient was then covered with hay, and left in this condition all night. If the bonds were found loose in the morning, he or she would recover; but if not, the case was counted hopeless, or, at least, doubtful."

We should imagine that there never could be much doubt about the result, and that it saved the patient's family much tedious nursing. Mr. Mackinlay's faith on one point is stronger than ours. On p. 48 he says:—

"In Scotland, the 4th of July used to be known as Martin of Bullion's Day, in honour of the translation of the saint's body to a shrine in the cathedral of Tours. There is some uncertainty about the origin of the term Bullion, though, according to the likeliest etymology, it is derived from the French bouillir, to boil, in allusion to the heat of the weather at that time of the year."

If Mr. Mackinlay can believe this, we cannot.

West Irish Folk-Tales and Romances. Collected and translated by William Larminie. (Stock.)—For nine long years Mr. Larminie has been "taking down" folk-tales from the dictation of peasants in Renvyle, Connemara, Achill Island, and Glencolumkill in Donegal, and this book contains a portion only of the store which he has gathered together. Translation, of course, has to be taken into account, but so far as is possible he has adhered to the words of his narrators. It is a fault on the right side, but there are many instances in which he has adhered almost too closely, and when he might with advantage have made changes which would in no wise have affected the value of the stories and would have made them much more intelligible. Take such a passage as this:—

"As soon as she got on the sea, no sooner did the serpent see her than she desired to swallow her, but before she reached as far as her, a billow of the sea rose between them, and left herself and the boat on dry land."

With this trifling exception we have nothing but praise to bestow on the book, which, however, owes much of its attraction to the poetical and picturesque language in which the Irish peasants told their stories. Their heroes always arrange to set out on their journeys "on the morning of the morrow," and rise "when the day whitens," and "wrestle till they bring the wells of fresh water up through the grey stones." Much the most interesting story in the collection is 'The Woman who went to Hell.' It has a fine flavour of antiquity about it, and is rich in mutilated or dimly shown fragments of ancient folk-lore, and is told most quaintly. A young man who has before birth been inadvertently sold to the devil, and who dies—i.e., is claimed by him—when he (the youth) has reached the age of eighteen, is apparently partly rescued from the adversary's power by his sweetheart's obeying his order to drag him out of his coffin and burn his body "till all was burnt." He returns from hell one night nearly a year after this, when her baby has just been born in his father's house, and flies in by the window in the shape of a white dove. His mother hears the baby cry, goes down, finds the door locked, peeps through the key-hole, and sees her dead son standing on the floor. She asks if it is he. He says that it is, and adds:—

"One glance of your eye has sent me for seven years (more, probably omitted) to hell. 'I will go myself in your place,' said his mother. She went then to go to hell. When she came to the gate, there came out steam so that she was burnt and scalded. It was necessary for her to return. 'Well,' said the father, 'I will go in your place.' It was necessary for him to return. The young man began to weep. He said he must go himself. The mother of the child said that she would go."

She goes, being, of course, carefully warned to eat nothing while in the under world, and, having a capacity for obedience, returns in time to her husband's home. It is curious to find Pat Minahan, the teller of this excellent folk-tale—of which our extract, chosen more for its quaintness than its goodness, gives very little idea—telling another story, 'Beauty of the World,' with a rather uncommon main incident which is to be found also in one of Straparola's stories. The hero spends all that he has at the time in rescuing a corpse from indignity, and procuring for it burial suitable to its rank. He is afterwards largely befriended by a stranger—in reality, the man's ghost—on condition that half of everything which his personal aid or gifts enable the hero to gain is given to the helper. In Straparola's story this ultimately means that a wife must be cut in two—in the other, a baby son. Needless to say, in both cases the ghost is only trying the honour of the hero, and disappears for ever as soon as he sees that it stands the test, and that no more help is wanted. There is a note on p. 138 which in a new edition should be omitted, for twice in the story it has been said that Simon's first wife is dead. If Mr. Larminie finds it sometimes difficult to follow the narrative, what must others do!

TRANSLATIONS.

Heavena. By Alois Vojtěch Smilovský. Translated by Prof. V. E. Mourek and Jane Mourek. (Bliss, Sands & Foster.)—Prof. Mourek and his coadjutor deserve more thanks than can always be accorded to the discoverers of foreign novels for presenting this Bohemian work of fiction to the English public. It is true there are some faults in construction, such as a fondness for presenting a situation and then going back to describe the events which led up to it, a certain shadowiness in two characters only second in importance to the hero, and a suggestion of crudeness in the ending; but they are all faults which seem to be due rather to an undeveloped literary tradition than to any more serious cause. Moreover, many faults could be pardoned in view of the entirely delightful picture of unselfishness and unworldliness in the good old village priest. He reminds one a little, perhaps, of M. Theuriot's Abbé Daniel and of other devoted village priests celebrated in fiction, but M. Smilovský's hero does not lose because there are others like him. The translation is so well done that in but few passages could it be detected as such.

Yanko the Musician, and other Stories. By Henryk Sienkiewicz. Translated from the Polish by Jeremiah Curtin. With Drawings by Edmund H. Garrett. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)—Mr. Curtin has already done good work as a translator from the Slavonic languages. He has caused some of the powerful romances of Sienkiewicz to be known among us, and now we have in English some of the lighter sketches of the same author. These have already earned considerable celebrity among the Poles. Our especial favourites in the little volume are 'Yanko the Musician' and 'Bartek the Victor.' The former is a weird tale of a young genius, who meets with an early death. In some respects it reminds us of one of the sketches of Halek. 'Bartek the Victor' is a story of a Polish recruit, who in the German ranks is obliged to fight against the French, the natural friends of his country. Wreath told how Steinmetz, to inspire his Polish troops, caused the national hymn of Poland to be played, and persuaded them that he was leading them against the detested Niemcy (Germans), himself being the very embodiment of the German spirit. Among the quaint little cuts with which the volume is adorned is one representing poor Bartek in his Pickelhaube. This is a tale which is tendentia, as also is the 'Diary of a Tutor in Poznan (Posen).' It tells us how the Poles are being improved off the face of the earth in Prussian Poland, and how harshly they are treated. We hear a great deal of their experiences among the Rumanians; it is well also to know how they fare at the hands of the Germans. The work of denationalization is done thoroughly by their Teutonic masters, but it is gradual and systematic, and all methods calculated to cause a European scandal are avoided. 'The Comedy of Errors, a Sketch of American Life,' does not strike us as so happy as the sketches previously cited. Sienkiewicz when off his own ground does not write so well; his humour has not the strength of his pathos. The literature of Poland may still be considered vigorous while she can boast such authors. Since the Poles use the Latin alphabet, we think it would be better if Mr. Curtin allowed the names to retain their original spelling; by his not doing so an uncouth appearance is communicated to them. Of the spirit and accuracy of Mr. Curtin's translations there can be no question.

Made in France: French Tales retold with a United States Twist. By H. C. Bunner. Illustrated by C. J. Taylor. (Fisher Unwin.)—The principle on which Mr. Bunner has set himself to anglicize, or rather to americanize, certain stories of the late M. de Maupassant's is, of course, not a new one. Thackeray had in his earlier days something of a fancy for it, and has left more than one specimen of the French story retold with an English twist. Yet critics are not much enamoured of the plan as a plan. Generally speaking, if the "reteller" is a man of genius he would be better employed doing purely original work; while if he is not a genius he is likely to make a mess of it. Besides, there is always a certain liberty taken with the original author, which those who know him "in his natural" are likely to resent, while those who do not know him may sometimes construe it to his injury or disadvantage. We cannot say that Mr. Bunner—whose own short stories have sometimes been extremely good of their kind—has removed our objections to this kind of adaptation. In the present volume, "Say, I didn't understand there was no such business as that," for instance, does not bring Maupassant's manner or characters very forcibly before the reader. And it can scarcely be maintained that Mr. Bunner has improved his chances by a combative critical proface, not merely exalting his author to a place which we may or may not be disposed to grant him, but laying down in a very peremptory manner reasons for that exaltation which are by no means assented to as soon as they are understood. Such a sentence, for instance, as that Maupassant, "broadly popular as he has proved himself, never hesitates to assume the absolutely Thackerayan attitude of talking to that man in the company who knows the most," appears to unite two of the most objectionable of all critical faults: the adoption of a non-natural manner and the laying down off-hand, and yet as if without appeal, extremely contentious and questionable propositions. In more ways than one, therefore, we think that Mr. Bunner has imperilled the achievement of his "sole hope," that of making Maupassant's inspiration clear to those who cannot or will not read him in the original. However, his work may prove readable, with the result of pleasure, to some of these unhappy persons. Sometimes (where there is the least "twisting," as in 'The Minuet') it is not unpleasant to us, and it is always well printed and very prettily illustrated.

Evening Tales. Done into English from the French of Frédéric Ortolé. By Joel Chandler Harris. (Sampson Low & Co.)—We confess to ignorance of M. Frédéric Ortolé—ignorance as to which inquiry among the cunningest in folk-lore has failed to enlighten us. Mr. Joel Chandler Harris vouches for him, and tells an interesting story as to the origin of these admittedly free versions of his 'Contes de la Veillée'; but he does not give us the date of M. Ortolé's book, or his publisher, or any detail that is his. On the other hand, there are parts of the stories which certainly read as if they had been translated from the French; and the second, 'Teenchy Duck' (which tells of the successive rallying of friends to the Duck's assistance and their successive exploits in her defence), is very like several French folk-tales. Meanwhile, the stories themselves are decidedly good and interesting. The first, 'A French Tar-baby,' might well arrest Mr. Harris's attention, for it enters quite curiously—so curiously, indeed, as to justify that taint of suspicion which may have appeared in our remarks—into the nigger beast-epic, Brer Billy Gont being substituted for Brer Fox. The remainder vary between the beast-fable and the Arabian Night type. 'The King and the Lapwings' is merely the old story of Solomon and the hoopoes, and was hardly worth giving; but nearly all the rest are fresh as well as good, and two—'Jump in my Sack' and 'The Enchanted Princess'—are first-rate. We are afraid the profane Briton will chuckle over 'The Rooster, the Cat, and the Hoop-hook,' in which the discreet word we have italicized recurs with a frequency altogether destructive of gravity. But America must, we suppose, be allowed to speak American. 'The Mysterious Island' is weak; but the part of the Queen of the Birds in 'Brother Tiger and Daddy Sheep' is very attractive; and 'The King of the Lions' has the old 'Renart' spirit in it, just as if it were Walloon and of the thirteenth century. Altogether we wish Mr. Harris had mentioned more details about the originals of these 'Contes de la Veillée'; but we are by no means displeased to have his paraphrase of them.

Eyes like the Sea. By Maurus Jókai. Translated from the Hungarian by R. Nisbet Bain. 3 vols. (Lawrence & Bullen).—Jókai has written several splendid romances, but 'Eyes like the Sea' is scarcely one of them, although crowned by the Hungarian Academy as the best national novel of 1890. The biographical and historical reminiscences might have made it valuable had they not been the réchauffage of so many predecessors. Jókai cannot let well alone; when he has done a good thing he seems impelled to repeat the effort from time to time, each dose being more and more diluted, reminding us of those writers Goethe accuses of putting too much water into their ink. This avowedly autobiographical novel takes the reader through many exciting scenes, more or less historic, of the Hungarian War of Independence under the just deceased patriot, Kossuth. Jókai poses as the hero, and a woman of aristocratic connexions as the heroine. Bessy, this heroine, is, doubtless unintentionally on her author's part, almost the only really interesting personage in the book. Had Jókai contented himself with portraying the development of this woman's character and the recital of her adventures, instead of swelling out his work with all kinds of superfluous matter, one of the finest efforts of his undeniable genius might have been the result. Judicious excision of some portions and the establishment of continuity between the remarkable episodes of Bessy's career would have done much to enhance the permanent interest of 'Eyes like the Sea.' In some respects the heroine reminds us of Becky Sharp and in others of Manon Lescaut, and in feminine dexterity and sexual eccentricities is no unworthy mate for either. Her actions are more than "shady," and all the author's skill, as well as the translator's, is requisite to render their recital acceptable to the sensitive morality of circulating libraries. Of the five men who take care of Bessy, or are taken care of by her, two, it is true, marry her; but one of them commits bigamy by doing so, and the other pays his life as the penalty. Being Jókai's, the work is naturally readable, and far better than the general run of three-volume novels, but it by no means shows Jókai at his best; it is too disjointed and too long drawn out, whilst the introduction of Petöfi is a grave mistake. The translation might have been better, and, seeing that Mr. Nisbet Bain is the responsible translator, it is strange that the English is by no means unimpeachable. That the innumerable French and German words and phrases with which the narrative is peppered are sometimes translated and sometimes not is not very material, but English equivalents should always have been given of the Hungarian, seeing the class of readers the work is chiefly intended for.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Messrs. PUTNAM'S SONS publish The Englishman at Home, by Mr. Edward Porritt, a work of the character of Mr. Escott's 'England,' but contained in one portable and well-written volume. It is a little dry, but its account of the English system of government and life is thoroughly accurate, and contains, indeed, hardly any errors. Among the few that we have noticed are the repeated allusion to the election of 1880 as having occurred in 1881, and a few slips on that very difficult matter—the forms of Parliament. It is curious that the author should tell us that it has come to be a rule that the motion thanking the Crown for the speech from the Throne shall be made by a borough member, and seconded by a county member; the fact being that until this year the rule has been the opposite, and that on the day on which this book reached us the first breach of the rule occurred, the address having been moved and seconded by Knights of the Shire. The next statement in the paragraph is that the mover and seconder appear in uniform, which was true until the day on which we read it, when this rule was broken by the seconder appearing in a frock coat. The statement that members on such occasions, if not entitled to wear military or naval uniform, "appear in the Windsor uniform, brown cloth with gold trimming, which may be worn by all members of the House of Commons on State ceremonial occasions," contains almost as many errors as words. The Windsor uniform is a private and domestic uniform of Windsor Castle, similar to, though different from, the private and domestic uniforms of the households of the Viceroy of Ireland, the Viceroy of India, and many other Courts. It has no connexion whatever either with the official or the household uniforms or with ordinary Court dress. The word "brown" in the account given points to ordinary Court dress, which no more belongs to members of the House of Commons than to any other British subjects. There is no uniform worn by members of the House of Commons, unless they choose, having been presented at Court—which very many have not—to wear one or other of the several different forms of Court dress. Error on such little points is inevitable, and the work on the whole is excellent and to be in every way commended, not only to the American public, but to that at home.

We have received from Messrs. Allen & Co. India's Princes, by Mrs. M. Griffith, a handsome illustrated volume, containing lives of the present native princes of India and descriptions of their capitals, with portraits of princes and views of capitals and some other illustrations. The volume is apparently meant chiefly for circulation in India and for presents, as the notices are altogether laudatory, both where praise is deserved and where it is not. In the first chapter, that is, even in the case of Kashmir, the late and the present Maharajahs are alluded to in terms which will be thought too complimentary by those who are acquainted with the country which in recent times they ruled.

Sam Houston and the War of American Independence in Texas, by Mr. Alfred M. Williams (an American book, published by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., of Cambridge, Massachusetts), contains the life of a man who was successively a Cherokee chief, Governor of Tennessee, commander of the insurgent Texans in the field against Mexico and conqueror of the famous Santa Anna, twice President of the Lone Star State or independent republic of Texas, United States senator, and lastly Governor of Texas. It could hardly fail to be of interest, and it constitutes not only a remarkable picture of one of the greatest of American Southern frontier-men, but also a history of the rise of Texas. General Houston, for many years of his life unfortunately known as "drunken Sam," was, even in his worst days, a sincere patriot and one of the most enlightened friends of good relations with the Indian tribes who ever laid down sound principles to unwilling ears, and in his later years there was no blot upon his escutcheon. The book is full of good stories, which have the advantage of being true: as, for example, that of Houston's commander-in-chief during the first days of his presidency of the republic, who being unfit for the command, but a noted duellist, announced that he should shoot the officer, whoever he might be, who might be sent to supersede him. An officer of equal courage was selected, duly sent, and duly shot—after which the commander-in-chief was let alone. Another good story is that of Houston's remark upon one of his friends who had turned traitor, to the effect that they must not be hard upon him, and that he had all the virtues of a dog except his fidelity.

Mr. BIRRELL appears to have made a mistake in reprinting his Essays about Men, Women, and Books (Stock). When they appeared in the Speaker they seemed agreeable enough; but now they are printed in a volume their extreme alightness is only too apparent.

We have received the catalogues of Mr. Dorman (fair), Messrs. Dulau (geology), Mr. Edwards (two catalogues), Mr. Ellington (interesting), Messrs. George & Son (rather interesting), Messrs. Gowers & Son, Mr. Highams (two theological catalogues), Mr. Hollings (good), Mr. Jackson (good), Mr. Jeffrey, Messrs. Luzac & Co. (Oriental literature), Mr. Maggs (good), Messrs. Maurice & Co. (three interesting catalogues, one of them of portraits), Mr. May (fair), Messrs. Myers & Co., Mr. Nutt (two good catalogues, one theological), Messrs. Rimell & Son (etchings, &c.), Messrs. Sothman (many of Dean Merivale's books), Mr. Spencer (good), and Messrs. Suckling & Galloway.

We have also on our table the catalogues of Messrs. Meehan of Bath (good), Mr. Baker, Mr. Hutchinson, and Mr. Thistlewood of Birmingham, Messrs. Matthews & Brooke (two) and Mr. Miles of Bradford, Messrs. George's Sons (topography) of Bristol, Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Baxendine, Mr. Brown (good), Messrs. Douglas & Foulis (interesting), and Mr. Johnston (two interesting catalogues) of Edinburgh, Mr. Carver of Hereford, Mr. Miles of Leeds, and Messrs. Young & Sons of Liverpool (good). We have to thank M. Nijhoff of the Hague for two valuable catalogues, and M. Rosenthal of Munich for a catalogue of interesting pièces historiques down to 1600.

We have on our table The Mark in Europe and America, by E. A. Bryan (Boston, U.S., Ginn).—The Philoctetes of Sophocles, edited by F. P. Graves (Boston, U.S., Leach & Co.).—An Elementary Treatise on the Geometry of Conics, by A. Mukhopadhyay (Macmillan).—On Riemann's Theory of Algebraic Functions and their Integrals, by F. Klein, translated from the German by F. Hardcastle (Cambridge, Macmillan & Bowes).—Genetic Philosophy, by D. J. A NEW DANGER FOR AUTHORS.

As my attention has just been called to the fact that a little one-volume story is now being advertised for sale under the same title as that of one of my best-known novels ('Victims,' published in three volumes by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, after having run as a serial through All the Year Round, and still in constant circulation), I shall feel greatly obliged if you will allow me, through the valued medium of your columns, to warn the reading public that the volume in question is not, as they might readily suppose, a cheap edition of my novel; nor am I in any way connected with it, except in the character of the "Victim," my title having simply been sold for the use to which it has been put by the parties into whose hands the copyright has unfortunately fallen, without my knowledge or consent, and naturally to my great detriment and annoyance. Transactions of this sort, by reason of their very rarity, are not at present attended with any legal penalty. If they become common, however, they will constitute a new danger for all authors who part with their copyrights, as well as a fraud on the public, who, expecting to buy a cheap copy of some favourite book, find themselves in possession of a work by an unknown writer, in whom, perhaps, they take no interest. I trust, therefore, that by giving publicity to the case in question you may be the means of saving some at least of my fellow writers, and the readers who appreciate them, from the risk of being "victimized" in similar fashion. THEO. GIRT.

THE ENGLISH ANCESTRY OF WASHINGTON.

120, Rue La Boétie, Champs Élysées, Paris.

HAVING discovered another line in the descent of General Washington; I venture to send you the results of my investigation.

George Reade, grandfather of Mrs. Lawrence Washington, the President's grandmother, was a descendant of the Reads of Facombe, county Southampton, variously spelled Read and Reade.

In 1585 John Englishe conveyed the manor of Linkenholt, county Southampton, to Andrew Reade for sixty years; and the redemption to Edward Hungerford and John Gwilym, and to the heirs of Edward Hungerford. But in 1586 Edward Hungerford and John Gwilym released all their right to Andrew Reade and his heirs.

The manor of Linkenholt, at the time of the Domesday survey, belonged to Ernalf de Herding, by whom it was given to the Abbey of St. Peter, Gloucester, coming into the possession of Henry VIII. by the dissolution of that house. The king thereupon conveyed this manor to Sir Thomas Wriotheslye, Knt., and his heirs. In the thirty-seventh year of the reign of Henry VIII. (1546), Sir Thomas, afterwards Lord Wriotheslye, sold his manor to Richard Read, Esq., afterwards knight; and in the same year Sir Richard parted with the manor to John Cheney, Esq. It continued with his son, Thomas Cheney, who, in 16 Elizabeth (1574), conveyed it by feoffment to Edmund Hungerford and Thomas Webbe, to the use of himself (Thomas Cheney) and Anne his wife, for the term of their lives and the longest liver of them; and after their decease to Robert Cheney, his son, and the heirs male of his body; and in default of such issue to Henry Cheney, another of his sons, and the heirs male of his body; the remainder to right heirs of Thomas, the father. In 1582 Thomas Cheney parted with the manor to John Englishe and his heirs. After Thomas's death in 1583, Anne and Robert Cheney conveyed the manor to the said John Englishe and his heirs, who in 1585 conveyed the manor to Andrew Reade and others, as above. In 1600 Andrew Reade, upon the marriage of his son Robert with Mildred, his last wife and the mother of all his children, conveyed the manor to the use of Robert Read for his life; and after his death, one moiety of the said manor to Mildred, Robert's wife, for her life for her jointure; and after her death that moiety and the rest upon Robert's death to Andrew Read, son of Robert, in tail, with remainder over.

Robert Read and Andrew, son of Robert, conveyed this manor to Mr. Windebank, Mr. Henry Read, and Mr. Nicholas Blake, and to the said Robert Read and his heirs. Robert Read, in 1627, by his deed, expressed the trust in Mr. Windebank, Mr. Henry Read, and Mr. Blake, and appointed the manor to be sold, and the monies to be disposed first in the deed; and shortly after died.

The manor was afterwards in the Worgan family, and then descended to the Rev. John Morton Colson, M.A., of Swanage, Dorset, and the Rev. John Morton Colson, LL.B., of Dorchester. It was lately sold by Mr. T. Morton Colson to Mr. Ratcliffe.

I have given the descent of this manor because it was in the possession of a direct ancestor of George Washington, namely, Andrew Reade, who, by the way, received an allotment of lands in county Cork, Ireland, the certificate of allotment being dated March 14th, 1586. He administered the effects of his son Andrew, July 4th, 1615. His will was dated October 17th, 1616 King James I. (1619). There was a codicil dated November 15th, 1621, and the whole was proved October 24th, 1623, by his son George Read, power being reserved to William Sotwell, Esq.—the other executor, Thomas Lambert, the elder, of Laverstocke, Esq., being dead. Andrew Reade in his will mentions his lease of the manor and rectory of Faccombe, his freehold lands in Faccombe, and the farm of Upstreete, in Faccombe. He mentions his great-grandchild and godson Andrew Hanwall. Andrew Reade married the daughter of — Cooke, of county Kent. It is possible that she belonged to a branch of the family of Sir Anthony Cooke, Knt., of Giddy Hall, county Essex, whose daughter Mildred became, in 1546, the second wife of William Cecil, afterwards Lord Burghley, Lord High Treasurer, ancestor of the present Marquis of Salisbury.

Andrew Reade had five sons—Henry, Robert, George, John, and Andrew; and four daughters—Winifred, who married — Dowse; Mary, who married Thomas Kebelthwaite; a third, name unknown, married Dr. Beard; a fourth, name also unknown, married William Blake.

The eldest son, Henry Read, of Faccombe, J.P. for county Hants, is mentioned in the will of his father, dated October 17th, 1619, and in that (December 10th, 1626) of his younger brother Robert, the direct ancestor of Washington's grandmother.

Henry Read died April 4th, 1647, and was buried in Faccombe Church. He married Anne, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Windebanks, of Haines Hill, in the parish of Huret, county Berks, who was Clerk of the Signet to Queen Elizabeth and King James I., and who died October 24th, 1607, and was buried in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Middlesex. His wife was Frances, daughter of Sir Edward Dymock, of Scrivelsby, co. Lincoln. By the tenure of his lands, Sir Edward Dymock officiated at the coronation of Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. This family still retains its singular office of "Champion," which it derives from the celebrated baronial house of Marmyon, through the Redes of Borstall.

Anne Windebanks, wife of Henry Read, died June 17th, 1624, in the fifty-third year of her age, and was buried in St. Michael's Church, Faccombe, co. Hants, in the chancel of which church on the north wall was formerly erected a fine brass set in alabaster, which, on the destruction of the old church, was placed in the new church at Faccombe. The brass displays the effigy of a lady wearing a wimple, an ample ruff, and otherwise attired in accordance with the fashion of the reign of James I. She is kneeling at a prie-dieu, with a Bible before her. A scroll proceeds from her mouth, with this sentence: "Sol. Christ. mihi sola sept." Two sons kneel on the right, and three daughters on the left; and beneath the figures, engraven with much spirit, is this inscription:—

"Here lyeth ye body of Anne Read, ye deare wife of Henry Read, Require, one of ye daughters of Sir Thomas Windebanks, Knight, Clarke of ye Signet to ye late Queen Elizabeth and to King James that now is. She was begotten of ye body of Frances Dymmock, one of ye daughters of Sir Edward Dymmock, of Sheerlsby [Scrivelsby], in ye county of Lincoln, Knight, Champion to ye said Queen Elizabeth and her successors, by the tenure of his lands. She departed this life to rest with her Saviour Christ, 17th day of June, 1624, in ye fifty-third year of her age, and left behind her issues of her body living two sons and three daughters, Margaret, Mildred, and Au."

Henry and Anne Read had two sons and three daughters. The eldest, Francis Read, of Oxford, writes to his cousin Robert Read, September 28th, 1640, who was then residing with their uncle, Sir Francis Windebanks, at Lennox House in Drury Lane:—

"I am hopeful the business of escuage for Faccombe may have respite without prejudice until my coming to London; for not having a copy of the last office I cannot learn by what part it is held."

On the 11th of October of the same year he wrote from Faccombe to his cousin Robert Read, saying that he had been the previous week in Gloucestershire, at the funeral of his dear neighbour Lady Rainford, and that his wife expects to be confined within a fortnight. He is mentioned in the will of his grandfather, Andrew Reade, as having issue in 1619, but no names are mentioned.

Robert Read, the second son, is mentioned in the will of his grandfather. There are also mentioned Margaret, Mildred (who married Thomas Mahew, of county Suffolk), and Anne, named after her grandmother, who married John Helyar, of Hasborne.

Returning to the line of Henry Read, and leaving for the moment his second brother, Robert Read, we will take up the other brothers.

George Reade, third son of Andrew Reade, was the executor of the will of his father in 1619, in which instrument he is mentioned as having issue, but no names are given.

John Reade, the fourth son of Andrew, was born at Faccombe in 1579. He was a scholar at Winchester College in 1591, and admitted a scholar of New College, Oxford, February 4th, 1598, in the place of George Risley, who died April 27th, 1598, and was buried in the college chapel. John Read probably died during his father's lifetime, as no mention is made of him in his father's will, dated October 17th, 1619. His brother, Andrew Reade, jun., of Faccombe, administered to his father, Andrew Reade, sen.

Robert Read, the second son of Andrew, and brother of Henry and the rest, was originally of Faccombe, county Southampton, and afterwards of Linkenholt, in the same county. He married three times. The name of his first wife is unknown. His second wife was Alice, daughter and sole heir of Francis Pooley, Esq. She died October 12th, 1598, and was buried in Faccombe Church. Robert Read, upon his marriage in 1600 with Mildred Windebanks, his third wife, who was the ancestress of Washington, obtained from his father the manor of Linkenholt. His will is dated December 10th, 1626. In it he mentions among others his nephew and cousin Francis Windebanks, and his cousin Nicholas Blake. Robert Read and Mildred Windebanks had six sons and two daughters.

Andrew, the eldest, is mentioned as follows in the will of his paternal grandfather Andrew:

"My executors to pay yearly to my grandchild Andrew Reade twenty pounds, to maintain him at one of the universities until such time as he shall be Fellow of one of the colleges: and then my wish is that he shall have twenty nobles a year to help him to enter into some further degree of learning, until his father's decease, and then the said sum of twenty pounds yearly to cease. And if my said grandchild shall profess Divinity, and shall be capable of a benefice with Cure, at the next avoidance of the Rectory and parish church of Faccombe, my executors shall present him thereto, and then also the said yearly sum of twenty nobles to cease."

He is mentioned as "Andrew Reade, D.D., of Lurgershall, county Wilts," in the House of Lords' Calendar, 1660.

Of his brother William I know nothing. The third brother, Dr. Thomas Reade, a noted Royalist, was of London. He was born at Linkenholt in 1606. On August 3rd, 1640, he writes from New College, Oxford, to his brother Robert, and again on September 28th of the same year. Robert was then secretary to their uncle, Sir Francis Windebanks. Dr. Thomas is mentioned in the will of his paternal grandfather Andrew. He was admitted scholar of New College, December 10th, 1624; Fellow, January 15th, 1626; LL.D., 1638; Advocate of Arches Court; Principal of Magdalen Hall, 1643; resigned his Fellowship, September 21st, 1645; and Edward Farmer, of the parish of St. Helen's, Abingdon, was admitted in his place. He had a king's letter in his favour, dated March 31st, 1624; and in 1643 traded a pike for King Charles in the university, and served his Majesty in the army, but on the decline of the king's cause changed his religion and became a secular priest; esteemed a good scholar and civilian. He died at Exeter House, in the Strand, near London, in 1669, and was probably buried in the Savoy Church. His nuncupative will is dated March 7th, 1668, administration being granted the following year to Christopher Windebanks, his cousin. In his will he says he has a half-brother at Lurgershall, not far from Andover, Wilts; and in that instrument he himself is described as Thomas Read, Doctor of Laws, in his chamber in Exeter House in the Strand, Middlesex.

The fourth brother, Robert Read, who is mentioned as secretary to his uncle Sir Francis Windebanks, who was principal secretary to King Charles I., was likewise named in the will of his paternal grandfather Andrew, and, as we have seen, in that of his own brother, Dr. Thomas Read, in 1668. He was then living at Paris. On July 19th, 1640, we know he received a letter from his brother Francis; and in a letter from Paris to his cousin Thomas Windebanks, March 19th, 1641, he speaks of a trunk which stood in his chamber at Whitehall, and regrets it was delivered away, "for there were many good things in it which I had gathered together, and such as had no relation to the State."

The next brother, George Reade, great-great-grandfather of General Washington, we will turn to in a moment. In passing, I may merely say there was a sixth brother, Francis Reade, already mentioned as writing to his brother in 1640. Of the two sisters, Alicia married Thomas Farwell, of co. Somerset. Of the other, Anne, I know nothing, except that she is mentioned in the will of her paternal grandfather, Andrew Reade, 1619, as being under twenty-one years of age and unmarried.

George Reade, fifth son of Henry Read and Mildred Windebanks, his wife, is mentioned in the will of his paternal grandfather Andrew, 1619. He went to Virginia about 1637. He is thus mentioned in the volume written for the Grolier Club by Mr. Moncreux Conway, entitled "Barons of the Potomack and the Rappahannock":—

"Twenty-two years before Col. John Washington is mentioned in the annals of Virginia appeared the Hon. George Reade, grandfather of Washington's grandmother, from whom probably came his name George. George Reade, brother of Robert, an official of the English State Office, temp. Charles I., came to Virginia on Government business in 1637. He resided with the Governor (Harvey) for a time; was made Secretary of the Colony, 1640-1; was afterwards twice elected Burgess for James City, and was a member of the Royal Council, 1647-60. His daughter Mildred married the famous Col. Augustine Warner, who had inherited from his father, an English officer, 2,500 acres in Kiskiack, on the Pianketank River. From this gentleman the name Augustine may have come into the Washington family."

This extract has been communicated to me by Mr. Conway, who expresses his interest in the solution of a problem which the students of Washington ancestry had thus far failed to solve. George Reade seems to have had four sons and one daughter, namely, Robert, Francis, Benjamin, Thomas, and Mildred, who married Col. Augustine Warner. This name of Mildred we see goes back to Mildred Windebanks; and if Andrew Read married into the same family of Cooke from which the Marquis of Salisbury descends, the name Mildred again would naturally come down through the different generations.

Col. Warner and Mildred Reade, his wife, had two daughters: Isabella, the younger, married John Lewis, sen.; while Mildred, the elder, married Lawrence Washington, son of Col. John Washington. Augustine, the second son of Lawrence and Mildred, was the father of President George Washington.

JOHN MEREDITH READ.

THE VERB "TERVE" IN CHAUCER.

A FREQUENT perusal of Chaucer's text leads me to suspect that several good original words, as used by the poet, have been suppressed not only by the editors, but even by the scribes, solely because they presented difficulty.

In this way I believe that the curious verb terve was twice employed in the 'Canouns Yemannes Tale,' Group G, 1171, 1274; where the editions all read terne or turne, with the supposed sense of "turn."

In the first case, Chaucer says that the cheating alchemist, having got hold of a dupe, would not give him up till he had plucked him. This he expresses by: "Til he had terved him, coude he not blinne."

In the second case, the poet invokes an imprecation on the cheat: "the deval out of his skin Him terve!"

It is the old difficulty of a confusion between n and u (for e). The scribe of the Ellesmere MS. did his best; for he actually wrote terve with a v (not u) in l. 1274, that there might be no mistake. In l. 1171 he had written terued; but of course this appears as termed in the printed text, as the word terued was unknown. The excellent Cambridge MS. has, in l. 1171, either teruede or teruede, the emphatic vowel being e. Most other MSS. have terne or turne.

In such a case the lectio difficilior must be considered, the more so because to say that a cheat could not leave off till he had turned a man gives no sense. How do you turn a man? You may turn him inside out, but merely to turn him gives no appreciable sense. What, then, is to terve?

Stratmann has one example, with the supposed sense of "roll," but it means rather, in that place, to roll over and over. Jamieson has ourtime, with two good examples from Wyntoun; it there means to upset, to turn upside down; for it is allied to topsy-turvy, on which see the note in the 'Supplement' to my larger etymological dictionary.

The 'Promptorium Parvulorum' has the curious sb. tirlf, the turning up of a hood or sleeve; also explained by "the tyrrynys up on an hood or sleeve." And Way notes that Palegrave has: "Turfe of a cappe or such like, rebras." See Rebras in Cotgrave.

I find the very word in the Bremen 'Wörterbuch': "Tarven, um tarven, up tarven, den Rand von einem Kleidungsstücke umschlagen, das innerste auswärts kehren"; with an example showing its particular use with respect to sleeves. Hence one sense was to fold back, to roll back the cuff of a sleeve; precisely the action of stripping off skin. Hence "out of his skin him terve" means "strip him out of his skin." And the cheat, we are told, stuck to his dupe till he had terved him, i.e., till he had turned him inside out. Shall we give up a reading that presents us with these expressive phrases? Surely not.

There is more behind. For the 'Prompt. Parv.' also has: "Ovyr-tyrvyn, Subvertu, ererto." Here again Way suggests that this is a mere error for over-terne, "notwithstanding that the King's Coll. MS. agrees with the Harl. MS. in the reading tyrvyn." How is a difficult word to struggle into admitted existence, if it is to be treated thus? A scribe who merely mistook n for u or r would certainly have written over-terryn; he would never have written y for u. As usual, the manuscripts are right; as any one may see by consulting Jamieson (as said above).

The frequentative verb was terfen, A.-S. terfian, to roll over and over; terfode (Ilotton MS. terfode) answers to the A.V. "wallowed" in Mark ix. 20 (Lat. text volubatur).

Nor is this all. For I am now able to correct a stupid blunder made by the editor of 'Havelok' (myself, to wit) in l. 603, where the printed text has Tirueden. Of course Tirueden is right; and mark how it brings out the sense. The story tells how a certain mark was found upon Havelok's shoulder as he lay asleep, "als he tirueden of his sark," i.e., "as they rolled back his sark or shirt from his throat." This is obviously better than "as they turned off his sark." Besides, the verb to turn cannot be spelt with an i; the only possible spellings of it in Middle English are terne, turne, and tourne.

I trust this revived word may be permitted, henceforth, to live. Cf. O.H.G. zerben, zirben, to turn round; Zirbelwind, a whirlwind.

WALTER W. SKRAT.

P.S.—Three more examples already: Of these, Mr. Gollancz supplied one. They are: tyrue, flay, misprinted tyrue ('Allit. Poems,' B. 630); tyruen, misprinted tyruen ('Gawain,' 1921); and see 'Wars of Alexander,' 4114.

SALE.

WE continue our account of the sale of the second portion of the library of the Comte de Lignerolles. The Œuvres de Louise Labé fetched 3,000 fr. The works of Racine, a copy of the edition of 1679, with the arms of Colbert on the binding, brought 3,500 fr.; another edition, with the portrait of Racine engraved in the seventeenth century, 4,120 fr. The Théâtre de Corneille, with the arms of Madame de Chamillart on the binding, 3,630 fr. La Borde Choix de Chansons mises en Musique (1773), 4,620 fr. A copy of Béranger, with steel engravings after Charlet, Lemud, &c., 5,000 fr. A copy of the Sentiments de l'Académie sur la Tragi-comédie du Cid, by Chapelain and Conrart (1638), which had belonged to Richelieu, 5,000 fr. A copy of La Fontaine on papier d'Hollande, with the arms of the Duc d'Aumont on the binding, 6,000 fr. A copy of Esther and Athalie, bearing on the binding the arms of the Duc de Montmorency, 6,020 fr.; and Bérault's Recueil de Vers amoureux (1602), 7,450 fr., a copy that belonged to Henri IV.

RARE EDITIONS.

Crouch End, March 19, 1894.

HAD not Mr. C. E. S. Chambers mentioned my name in connexion with a book miscalled 'Rare Editions,' I should not have supposed that his letter in your issue of Saturday last had reference to me. My name is, however, unmistakable, and though the writer has misquoted the title of the work, and frequently drawn his own conclusions from words I never used, still the context of his letter, taken as a whole, leaves no doubt that Mr. Chambers has determined to enjoy himself by making a Roman holiday at (if possible) my expense. The first edition mania has taken such a firm grip of certain specialist book-collectors that they cannot bear to be told what they must in their hearts have begun by this time to suspect, that the prices they pay are generally arbitrary and frequently ruinous, though not, indeed, to the pocket, for these gentlemen have usually plenty of money to part with. Mr. Chambers is evidently a much too sanguine and enthusiastic collector to be convinced of this on general grounds, but he is no doubt open to facts and ready to listen to proof. In the first place I must deny that I have said at all recently that "early editions of Scott are in no demand."

This wide inference is not justified by any words I have used lately. In the columns of the Athenæum and elsewhere I have repeatedly called attention to the fact that special (very) copies were rapidly increasing in value, and the reason of the omission of Scott from my list was that his works have not, as yet, attained to any settled pecuniary position, and it would have been impossible to assign them one. Without wishing to be egotistical, I may claim that I was the first to call attention to the fact that modern collectors, if consistent, could not long neglect Scott, whose works in boards, as issued, were at the time selling by auction, with few exceptions, for something like 10s. the three volumes, original editions. This, however, is a controversial point it is not necessary to argue, and I will make Mr. Chambers a present of his conclusions with pleasure. When, however, he says that a set of Ainsworth's Magazine sold at the Lawrence sale for 40l., which indeed it did, and insinuates that that sum is about what an average set is worth, I answer, first, that I never denied either assertion or suggestion, and secondly, that if I had done so, it would be an easy matter to prove that the series in question was not an ordinary one, but quite the contrary. It was Ainsworth's own set, perfectly clean and uncut. It may be that a complete series of the twenty-six volumes would be worth 40l. under average conditions, though I doubt it; but the contention cannot be supported, for no other sale is recorded as having taken place for many years. Whatever the truth in this respect may be, it is a mistake to say that I value the first octavo edition of 'The Miser's Daughter' at 1l. 10s. (see p. 10, l. 20, misquoted). Mr. Chambers wishes to know when a copy of 'Windsor Castle' in parts sold for 4l. 4s. I reply on December 8th, 1890, at Sotheby's.

Dickens's "Library of Fiction," or rather the series bearing that name, to which he contributed 'The Tug at Ramsgate,' has been sold by auction on five and not two recent occasions—once for 3l. 10s. (original cloth). 'Sketches by Boz,' 3 vols., first and second series, 1836-7, may or may not be well priced at 9l., for ordinary copies are hardly ever met with. All that have appeared in the auction-room lately have either been very good or very bad. The copy sold in December last for 15l. 15s. was not "medium" at all, but highly exceptional. It was in morocco extra by Zaehnsdorf, with all the advertisements and cloth covers bound up, and uncut. The Mackenzie copy, also alluded to by Mr. Chambers, was bound by Rivière and uncut; it had extra portraits inserted, also an autograph letter from Cruikshank, and a number of extra plates from other editions. The Burnett copy was bound by Zaehnsdorf in accordance with all the collector's stringent rules. Mr. Burnett's copy of the first demy 8vo. edition, 1839 (17l. 15s.), was also a work of art in morocco. A clean and sound copy in the original cloth sold for no more than 6l. in June last. The prices realized at the Mackenzie and Burnett sales are acknowledged on all hands to have been altogether exceptional. In like manner, the 'Memoirs of Grimaldi,' first edition, 1838, original cloth, has sold for 5l. (Sotheby's, May 24th, 1890) and less. A copy of the 'Pic-Nic Papers,' original edition, 3 vols. 1841, sold for 1l. 18s. last year (original cloth); of 'Con Cregan,' 2 vols. first edition, 4l. 7s. 6d. (original cloth); and a copy of 'Paul Goslett's [sic] Confessions,' 1l. 8s. in March. The 1843 edition of 'Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities' in cloth has sold for 9l. on two recent occasions, and a copy of the 1854 edition of 'Handley Cross,' 1l. 14s. (original cloth). I mention these prices as having been obtained not for expensively bound copies in the best conceivable condition, but for very fair ones, and also to show that Mr. Chambers's valuations as well as his statements of reputed fact are far from reliable.

Again, the statement that the last copy of 'Pendennis' sold in parts realized 5l. 6s. in 1889 is quite erroneous. The later record is 2l. (April 1st, 1890), 2l. 8s. (December 9th, 1890), 3l. 15s. (October 29th, 1891), and there may be later quotations. Mr. Chambers also wishes to know when 'A Curious Dance round a Curious Tree' sold for 2l. 10s. I say on February 27th, 1889, at Sotheby's (original wrappers), and further that very fair copies have sold for less on other occasions. It seems to me that your correspondent has an exaggerated idea of the value of books of this kind, and in any case it is not advisable, if he will permit me to say so, to quote booksellers' catalogues as evidence. The dealers have their profit to make, and have doubtless had Mr. Chambers's address for years. Of course, I quite understand the reason of that gentleman's objections. It is a distressing thing to pay a large sum for a book only to be haunted with a suspicion later on that half the amount has vanished into air; but from any view of the case I cannot imagine any one being sufficiently foolish to give 40*s.* for a copy of the first octavo edition of 'Sketches by Boz'; whether in green or brown cloth makes no matter.

The title of the book which has furnished the opportunity for putting me right is 'Early Editions, a Bibliographical Survey of the Works of some Popular Modern Authors.' If I had thought that Leech and Cruikshank were popular authors I should have included them, notwithstanding the qualificative "some." Scores of works illustrated by these artists are described under the names of their authors, which I believe to be the usual and convenient course adopted in similar cases. It was inevitable that a book of this kind should be criticized, especially on the question of prices, even to the length of calling attention to an obvious misprint, 1646-7 instead of 1846-7, in connexion with Bell's Life; for if the information given should be followed to any material extent by collectors of works of the kind mentioned, it must have the effect of levelling fictitious and fanciful quotations.

The "first edition" movement is the outcome of what was originally a mere fashionable pastime. Some of the books—though not all by a long way—have much to commend them, being pleasant to look at and instructive to read; but I submit that when bought and sold like slaves they become mere blocks, useless to the owner, and a bad investment from any point of view. How often do we see libraries of one kind or another sold for a half or less of what they cost to form! In some cases the sacrifice is well made, for the books have contributed to the instruction and enjoyment of a lifetime, and so grown poor with age; more respectable even than, I think, in their faded covers, than 'Con Oregan' at a fictitious value of 12*s.* 12*s.* in all its glory to the last.

In 'Early Editions' the prices given are reasonable for average copies of the kind described, and are moreover based on statistics furnished by the open market, which I have more opportunity of studying than Mr. Chambers can possibly have, unless, indeed, he keeps a staff for the purpose of compiling them. When everything is said, however, it is possible that both of us may be right, for it depends upon the point of view from which these matters are looked at; but in any event I object to acknowledge Mr. Chambers's "corrections," though I am bound to accept his criticisms.

J. H. SLATER.

Hertford, March 19, 1894.

In the letter with the above heading in the Athenæum of the 17th inst. the writer, no doubt by a slip of the pen, states that 'Guy Fawkes' was published in Atterworth's Magazine. It did appear serially, but in Bentley's Miscellany, with illustrations by Geo. Cruikshank, beginning in vol. vii. (1840) and ending in vol. x. (1841).

C. N. Watts.

MR. ROBERT CLARK.

THE unexpected death at Pau on Saturday last, in his sixty-ninth year, of Mr. Robert Clark, the senior partner in the firm of R. & R. Clark, of Edinburgh, will be regretted by a wide circle of friends, and some notice in these columns is due to his remarkable achievements in the typographic art. The son of a solicitor at Montrose, Mr. Clark served his apprenticeship as a printer with the late Mr. Burness, of Edinburgh. He then came up to London, and worked as a journeyman compositor, in the offices first of Messrs. Clowes and then of Messrs. Vizetelly, for two years, at the completion of which period, in 1846, he returned to Edinburgh and started business on his own account in Hanover Street. Having himself thoroughly mastered every detail of his art, Mr. Clark at once set himself to attain the highest excellence in workmanship. Those who only knew him in later years, when his keen interest in the minutiae of printing was still most striking, can well imagine with what enthusiasm he must as a young man have thrown himself into his work. His most marked characteristic was thoroughness. He was never content with the second-best. Careless or slovenly work was quite intolerable to him, and he never grudged the outlay necessary to preserve that perfect condition of material which is essential to the production of first-class work. And so, too, his judgment and taste were freely and constantly exercised in the choice and arrangement of type, in the questions of measure and proportion, and particularly in the setting of the title-page, which, though the last, is by no means the least point to be considered in the production of a book. It was this ceaseless concern for beauty of form and perfection of workmanship which gradually laid the foundation of his success; and it is for these qualities, mere material success apart, that the name of Robert Clark deserves to be placed alongside those of Baskerville and Foulis, if not those of Aldus and the Stephani.

Editions of Scott's poems, with illustrations by Sir John Gilbert, are named among the earliest works which drew attention to the new firm. These were produced soon after, in 1856, he had moved to larger premises on the west side of Hanover Street; but the first great impetus was given to the business when, on the abolition of the paper duty, Mr. Clark's uncle, the late Mr. Adam Black, put into his hands the printing of the Waverley Novels. This was in 1861, and from that time business in Scotland grew steadily until, about ten years later, some of the leading English publishers, attracted by the uniform excellence of its work, began to employ the Edinburgh firm. This English connexion developed rapidly, and in 1882 Messrs. Clark found it necessary to move from Hanover Street into more extensive premises specially built in Brandon Street, which in the convenience and completeness of their arrangements are probably second to none in the world.

Among the earlier of the many choice books which bear the now famous imprint may be named the first edition of Mr. Whymper's 'Scrambles in the Alps,' and Mr. Clark's own historical account of the 'Royal and Ancient Game of Golf,' the superintendence of a second edition of which was one of its author's main interests in the last year of his life. Later on came the second and third editions of Hamerton's 'Etching and Etchers,' his 'Landscape,' 'Man in Art,' &c.; Guilleminard's 'Cruise of the Marchesa'; Pennell's 'Pen Drawing'; Whymper's 'Travels in the Andes,' and the recent reprint of his 'Scrambles'; Caldecott's 'Old Christmas'; Hugh Thomson's 'Vicar of Wakefield,' 'Cranford,' &c., and many other books more or less elaborately illustrated. But it was not only in these books on a large scale that Mr. Clark and the partners whom he thoroughly imbued with his spirit reached a high standard of perfection. Their success has been no less conspicuous in ordinary and straightforward work. To take but one example—it would be hard to find a greater triumph of typographical art than the current edition in one volume of Tennyson's 'Poems.' It was a matter of special pride and interest to Mr. Clark that in the few weeks succeeding Lord Tennyson's death no fewer than twenty-six machines were occupied at one time in printing this and other editions of the poet's works, an event undoubtedly unique in the annals of printing.

The mention of Mr. Clark's book on golf, which has been generally accepted as the standard authority on the game in its historical aspect, recalls one of the most attractive features in his character—his keen delight in every form of manly sport. In golf particularly the thoroughness which distinguished everything he took in hand led to conspicuous success. He was for many years one of the foremost of players, and in 1864 carried off the gold medal at St. Andrews, which was then the most coveted prize open to golfers. He was also an ardent and skilful fisherman.

Of Mr. Clark's personal qualities this is hardly the place to speak; suffice it to say that in the course of a long and successful business career he never failed to win the esteem and regard of those with whom he came in contact, whether publishers, authors, paper-makers, or members of his own calling. His perfect frankness and simplicity, his genial mode of address, his invariable kindness of heart, his racy speech, exercised a charm which few could resist. The impression of his striking and vigorous personality, of the strong handsome face surmounted of late years by a mass of white hair, will not soon be effaced from the memory of his friends.

Literary Gossip.

LORD HOUGHTON, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, will be proposed at the next annual meeting of the Royal Literary Fund as President of the corporation, in succession to the late Earl of Derby.

A FURTHER volume of Mr. Noel Sainsbury's 'Calendar of Colonial State Papers, America and West Indies,' is ready in the press, and will be issued in a few days. It will cover the eventful years 1675-6, but a large portion of the 'Calendar' is devoted to the addenda since 1574, which have been collected during the last ten years from various sources. These additions will render the official calendar "as complete as possible," and some interesting particulars of nearly all the famous explorers of the Elizabethan period will be found here. These supplementary papers also include valuable references to the early history of Virginia, extracted from the Foreign Office correspondence. The Colonial Papers of the years 1675-6 contain full particulars of Bacon's rebellion and the Indian and negro risings of those years. They also comprise some interesting memorials of Locke.

GEORGE EGERTON, whose acquaintance with Scandinavian literature is indicated in 'Keynotes,' has in hand a translation of Hovr Ola Hausson's 'Tolke og Seere,' a volume of critical essays, which will appear under the title of 'Interpreters and Seers.' George Egerton is engaged also on a vocabulary of fishing terms in four languages.

THERE appears to be a feeling amongst the graduates of London University that the report of the Gresham Commission somewhat cavalierly dismisses or ignores the schemes submitted to it by the University for an immediate organization of seven teaching faculties. The Annual Committee of Convocation is now considering the recommendations of the Commission, and will report to an extraordinary meeting of Convocation, which has been summoned upon requisition for the 10th of April, a month in advance of the regular meeting.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD & SONS will publish early in April a new volume by Miss Beatrice Harraden, entitled 'In Varying Moods.' The book will be uniform in size and price with 'Ships that Pass in the Night,' by the same author. Miss Harraden will contribute a short story to Blackwood for April, entitled 'A Bird of Passage.' The same number will contain an account, by one who was present, of Emerson's meeting with De Quincey at Edinburgh in the beginning of 1848; 'Rabelais at Home,' by R. E. P., presumably the new editor of the Quarterly; and 'Trouting Tattle,' by Sir Herbert Maxwell.

MESSRS. METHUEN will bring out soon Prof. Petrie's 'History of Egypt, from the Earliest Times to the Hyksos.' It is the first instalment of a history of Egypt in six volumes, intended both for students and for general reading and reference. In the earlier periods every trace of the various kings will be noticed, and all historical questions will be fully discussed. The special features will be that the illustrations will be largely photographic, or from facsimile drawings, and, so far as practicable, of new material not yet published; that references will be given to the source of each statement and monument, thus affording a key to the literature of the subject; and that lists are supplied of all the known monuments of each king. The second volume will cover the eighteenth to the twentieth dynasty; the third the twenty-first to the thirtieth dynasty; the fourth will be devoted to the Ptolemaic rule; the fifth to Roman rule; and the sixth to Mohammedan rule. This last will be written by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole.

THE question of obliterating the betting matter in the newspapers in use at free libraries seems to be constantly cropping up. The subject has just been discussed by the town councillors of Southport, when, by twenty-seven votes to four, the proposed obliteration was negatived.

MR. ALMACK writes that he is preparing a paper on the editions of the 'Icon Basilike,' and will be grateful for information:

"Any copies kindly lent may be addressed to me, care of Edward L. Scott, Esq., Keeper of the Manuscript Department, British Museum. Any particulars relating to William Dugard and Richard Royston will be of great interest; also anything relating to the Rev. Edward Simmons, John Grisman, Thomas Milbourn, Roger Norton, and — Oudart."

A NEW edition of Mr. Coventry Patmore's collected poems will be issued early in April.

MR. PETER TERRY writes:—

"I knew a good deal of the father of Mr. W. H. Smith, and just remember seeing once or twice his brother when they were in partnership in Duke Street. He never appeared an energetic man, and his was altogether unlike the unrestful manner of the other. I recollect, too, the shop in St. Clement's Churchyard where travelling bags and stationery were exhibited—the newspaper department was then at the back of the shop. Often I have seen the old man hurrying along the street as if his life depended on his obtaining some object. One day I was at the Standard office when the paper was sevenpence, and a very small size too. It was then published in Bridge Street, Blackfriars, and Mr. Charles Baldwin was proprietor. Mr. Smith came down in an angry state because his man had not arrived with the papers, and addressing Mr. Fisher, the publisher, he asked why his man 'had not been supplied—I must see Mr. Baldwin.' Mr. Baldwin was in an adjoining room, and came out, telling the publisher to let Mr. Smith have his papers as soon as possible. In a few minutes this was done, and Mr. Smith himself took them under his arm (about four quires) and marched off. The machinery for printing was then not adequate to meet the demand, and only the Times was printed by steam. The elder Mr. Smith was the origin of a monopoly which did not please at all other newspaper agents—he would be served first. On one occasion a publisher of a weekly newspaper had departed from this rule, and finding his man waiting his turn, he told the publisher he should send other papers instead, and actually cancelled his order and carried out his threat. The late Mr. W. H. Smith told a friend of mine that 'he could manage the business, but he could not manage his father.' I always found Mr. W. H. Smith an agreeable, genial man, and have had frequent opportunities of seeing him on business matters. It is something about fifty years ago that he told me of a heavy loss he had sustained from a house at Eden Quay, Dublin, of 3,000*l.* through the insolvency of the firm. He had supplied them for only a few years, and in consequence of this loss went to Ireland and made arrangements to take over the concern, which he carried on some time, but I believe that it is now in other hands. Mr. W. H. Smith showed considerable interest in the prosperity of the Newsvendors' Benevolent Institution, and in a practical way helped to increase its funds. The latter years of his life he worked too hard in Parliament. From a letter he sent me in September, 1890, from abroad, I make this extract: 'I am endeavouring to shake off at sea the effects of the parliamentary session, and have every hope fresh air and rest will thoroughly reinvigorate me. I am almost inclined to envy you your leisure."

"I was interested in noticing on p. 82 of the first volume of the biography how the firm acted on receiving a command to supply newspapers to the Royal family. The Observer (a Sunday paper) was one of the papers required; they could not supply that, as no business was done by them on that day, being contrary to their rules. This reminds me of a circumstance that occurred when the father of Mr. W. H. Smith formed one of a committee who met in Fleet Street, and drew up a memorial addressed to the proprietors of several Sunday journals, to try to influence them to cease the publishing on that day, and bring out an edition on the Saturday instead. A request was made to have an interview with the proprietors. Some responded, and were willing to fall in with our views, provided that one paper, which had then a large circulation, agreed to our proposal. This was the Dispatch, then the property of Alderman Harmer, and one of the chief writers, under the name of 'Caustic,' was the editor. In response to our appeal, the proprietors appointed a day for an interview, but prior to this an article appeared in the paper abusing the committee in a style most disgraceful. I remember the old man meeting the committee, pointing out the language used, and saying, 'What is the use of going before men who already condemn our movement before our reasons are given for desiring the alteration? We will not go'; and the deputation did not meet them."

The newsagents have of late been bestirring themselves with a view to put down Sunday trading; but we fancy too many people desire to buy a paper on Sunday to make the suppression of their sale possible. Lloyd's, for instance, has been increasing of late, it is understood, its already huge circulation, and it is not impossible it may before long reach the enormous figure of a million of copies a week. The majority of these are bought on Sunday, and how are the news-vendors to stop a trade like this? The publishing of newspapers on Good Friday and Christmas Day the agents may be able to prevent if they set the right way to work; but the Sunday paper has outgrown them.

A somewhat notable contribution to Yorkshire literature is announced for publication, by subscription, during the present month. It is entitled 'From Edenvalde to the Plains of York,' and will form a quarto volume containing about two hundred illustrations. Mr. Edmund Bogg, of Leeds, author of 'A Thousand Miles in Wharfedale,' is the writer and publisher.

MR. W. J. HARVEY, the editor of 'Alumni Cantab,' has now ready for the press his 'Bibliography of Privately-printed Books,' for which he has been collecting materials during many years.

FATHER POPE, of the Birmingham Oratory, is preparing for reissue in English the life of St. Philip Neri written in Italian by Cardinal Capuciatro. By the publication of this translation in two volumes the English sons of St. Philip will celebrate the fourth centenary of their founder's death.

MESSRS. THURNAM & SONS, of Carlisle, are publishing, under the auspices of the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian and Archaeological Society, the 'Royal Charters of Carlisle.' Mr. Chancellor Ferguson is the editor.

MR. GEORGE RADFORD, who will be remembered for his association with 'Obiter Dicta,' will publish a volume of essays with Mr. T. Fisher Unwin under the title of 'Shylock and Others.' The "Others" are 'Robin Hood,' 'The Sources of "Hamlet,"' 'Hamlet's Madness,' 'Johnson's "Irene,"' 'Pantocracy,' 'Socrates on Politics,' and 'King Arthur.'

STRICKER'S poem 'Artus von Blumenthal,' which is the only German Arthurian work not yet published, will shortly be included in the series "Germanistische Studien," to be edited henceforth by Prof. F. Vogt, of Breslau. Some extracts from the Middle High German epic, in which the warlike element is paramount, were given as far back as 1857 by Prof. Bartsch in his edition of Stricker's 'Charles the Great.' Dr. G. Rosenhagen will now edit the poem in its complete form.

FRIEDRICH BODENSTEIN'S monument is to be unveiled at Wiesbaden on April 22nd, being the seventy-fifth anniversary of his birth.

MESSRS. MASKELYNE write to us that we are mistaken in supposing that their type-writer could be sold for ten guineas. They say that the raw material of each machine as delivered at their works costs 2*l.*, and the "type actuating" portion of the machine, in fact, consists of thirty-two little instruments, each of which is complete in itself, and, if sold separately for 5*s.*, would be considered a marvel of cheapness. There are, therefore, only 10*s.* left to pay for the greater portion of the machine and the final adjustments.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week include University of Aberdeen, Report as to Statistics (2*d.*); Charities, County of London, Return showing Charities applicable exclusively within any Parish, &c., the Trustees of which have omitted to send in Accounts (1*d.*); and Thirty-ninth Annual Report on the Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Scotland in 1893, together with the Annual Report on Vaccination (6*d.*).

SCIENCE

The Partridge: Natural History, by the Rev. H. A. Macpherson; Shooting, by A. J. Stuart-Wortley; Cookery, by George Saintsbury. (Longmans & Co.)

THIS first instalment of the new "Fur and Feather Series," edited by Mr. A. E. T. Watson, of "Badminton Library" repute, is a handy, well-printed volume, and has the additional merit of being illustrated by three artists of standing—Messrs. Thorburn, Charles Whympere, and the author of the second section. Seven chapters are devoted to the natural history of our familiar grey partridge at home and abroad, the introduced "red-leg," or "Frenchman," being accorded only a passing reference, though Mr. Saintsbury has something to say later, from a gastronomic point of view. On the whole, Mr. Macpherson has done his work well, though some of his "gold" is beaten out to the extreme of thinness, owing, perhaps, to the exigencies of his editor. We are glad to see that sound views are held respecting the migration of partridges, and that their supposed flights across twenty miles of sea from France—to say nothing of Belgium—are considered as "not proven"; though it is admitted that rivers, and even estuaries, are no barriers during the partial movements which take place in our islands. In Northern Germany large migrations are of almost annual occurrence, the birds being smaller and greyer in colour than the residents, and being in packs, they are excessively wild; these are well known as Zugvögel, and are supposed to be driven from the Baltic provinces and Russia by cold and scarcity of food. Added to these disadvantages, partridges have a scourge in the north of Europe in the shape of the goshawk, a species which is now a rare visitor to the British islands, and was probably not numerous at any time; but before the general destruction of birds of prey in the present century the hen-harrier must have taken severe toll of young birds, for, although one of the "ignoble" hawks, this—especially the female—is a much more dashing species than most of its congeners. Not many years ago we watched one of these making swoop after swoop at a brood of "cheepers" retreating to cover, protected by the two parents, which boldly faced the assailant, leaping up occasionally like game-cocks. "Hen-driver" Isaac Walton styled this hawk, and we are by no means certain that "hen" in this sense is not derived from the Teutonic hahn, and originally referred to the partridge rather than the domestic fowl; but that is contentious matter. Mr. Macpherson has taken up with the word lush, an abbreviation of "lushious," applied to herbage on one solitary occasion—and for metrical reasons—by Shakespeare, and lately adopted by writers of the new school for milkmaids and other buxom creatures, to prove conversely, we suppose, that "all flesh is grass."

It might be thought that after the volume on 'Shooting' in the "Badminton" series, followed by Sir Ralph Payne-Gallwey's 'Letters,' little could be left for Mr. Stuart-Wortley to say on the subject of sport; nevertheless he has succeeded in producing more than 130 pages of instructive as well as amusing matter. The strong feature of his contribution—and the one which should be laid to heart by every game-preserver—is his insistence upon the necessity of cultivating harmonious relations with those persons who live upon and draw their living from the soil. Again and again owners are reminded that these, "if not allowed to participate in some way in the benefits derived from a stock of game, will be liable to view its existence with a more or less hostile envy"; and that "the pleasure and profits from sport should be as much as possible shared by those living on and around a game estate." If this golden rule were followed, there should be no want of sympathy between owner and tenant, for partridges are not enemies, but friends, to the farmer—feeding, as they do, largely on insects and grass seeds, while the grain which they consume in harvest-time is merely that which has fallen and would otherwise be wasted. Incidentally Mr. Stuart-Wortley observes that hares "should never be allowed to disturb friendly relations with good farmers, nor to interfere with the interests of the partridge." He contends that, with proper care and attention, the number of the latter might be greatly increased, wherever light and well-drained soil, good water, a bracing climate, and natural nesting-ground are to be found; but to take full advantage of these favourable conditions the modern keeper must devote to the partridge some of the attention he now gives almost exclusively to the pheasant. It was through careful management alone that in 1887 The Grange, Hampshire, beat the record with 4,109 partridges to seven guns on October 18th to 21st inclusive, surpassing the best for Holkham, or any other estate in the famed Eastern Counties. It is almost superfluous to add that these heavy bags are made by "driving," and that the man who can hit driven partridges can hit anything. The details respecting this form of sport are excellent; and so are the remarks upon land as the greatest of luxuries, coupled with the fact that some of the shrewdest men of the present day have been investing largely in it during the late period of depression.

In dealing with the observations upon cookery, by Mr. Saintsbury, we praise ourselves, rather than such a passed-master of the art, by saying "ditto" to his axiom that "in the case of all game-birds, but especially in those which have the most distinct character and taste, the simplest cookery is the best." The counsel of perfection is that if partridges are young, properly hung, and properly cooked, the more utterly "simple of themselves" they are kept, the better. But man desires variety, and seeks after a new thing, for, as Darwin said, "folly is the habit of mind that never tries an experiment"; therefore Mr. Saintsbury teaches us all the lawful, and not absolutely barbaric, changes that may be rung in the cookery of our delicious brown bird. As for the red-leg, we have eaten him under all possible conditions in France and Spain, after he has been feeding upon small white snails, grapes, and other things which are supposed to enhance his flavour, and we agree with Mr. Saintsbury that Madame Emilie Lebour-Faussett was not justified in attributing to insular prejudice our preference for the grey bird. Still, perdreux aux choux or chartrouse of partridge is an excellent dish, though the bacon and the sausage should only be included in the case of old, dry birds, or under the bracing conditions of exercise and a healthy appetite. Suffice it to add that in this able treatise Mr. Saintsbury provides a number of positive receipts, as well as collateral hints which ought to be sufficient to enable any one of moderate culinary skill to arrange partridge every day throughout the season without once duplicating the dish.

MR. W. PENGELLY, F.R.S.

SCIENCE in the west of England has rarely had, during the last half century, a more enthusiastic advocate than Mr. William Pengelly. His birthplace was the village of East Looe, in Cornwall; but he was identified, by virtue of long residence, with Torquay and its neighbourhood. Such leisure as he could spare from a busy life was devoted to the study of geology and prehistoric archaeology, and in both these departments of knowledge he made a decided mark. One of his notable researches was a study of the lignite deposits of Bovey Tracey, the fossils of which were examined by the late Dr. Oswald Heer, of Zurich; and though doubt has been thrown upon some of Heer's work, the monograph which they jointly produced remains a volume of much value. But Mr. Pengelly is best known popularly as the explorer of Kent's Cavern. Although the exploration was nominally carried on by a committee of the British Association, Mr. Pengelly was always the leading spirit and the active worker; and it was to his pen that the Association owed a long series of annual reports. Gifted with remarkable fluency, vivacity, and humour, he was naturally a popular speaker, whose addresses were always a welcome feature at the meetings. His energy has left many enduring local results, for it was mainly due to his initiative that Torquay founded its Natural History Society and Devonshire its Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature, and Art.

Mr. Pengelly was born on January 12th, 1812, and at the time of his death, which occurred on the 16th inst., he had consequently reached the ripe age of eighty-two.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 13.—Right Hon. Lord Kelvin, President, in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Experimental Investigation on the Effective Temperature of the Sun,' Messrs. W. E. Wilson and P. L. Gray; 'The Thermal Radiation from Sunspots: Preliminary Notes of Observations made at Darnmoor, Strete, co. Westmeath, 1893,' by Mr. W. E. Wilson; 'On the Liquefaction of Silver-copper Alloys,' by Mr. E. Matthey; 'Experiments on a Fundamental Question in Electro-Optics: Reduction of Relative Retardations to Absolute,' by Dr. Kerr; 'A Contribution to the Study of Descending Degenerations in the Brain and Spinal Cord, and of the Seat of Origin and Paths of Conduction of the Fits in Absinthe Epilepsy,' by Mr. R. Boyce; 'On the Influence of Carbonic Acid and Oxygen upon the Coagulability of the Blood in vivo,' by Prof. A. E. Wright; 'On the Disappearance of the Leucocytes from the Blood, after Injection of Peptone,' by Surgeon-Capt. D. Bruce; 'A Research into the Elasticity of the Living Brain and the Conditions governing the Recovery of the Brain after Compression for Short Periods,' by Dr. A. G. Levy; and 'On the Effects produced on the Circulation and Respiration by Gunshot Injuries of the Cerebral Hemispheres,' by Dr. Kramer and Prof. Horsley.

NUMISMATIC.—March 13.—Mr. A. E. Copp, Treasurer, in the chair.—Messrs. P. W. P. Britton, W. de Bracy Herbert, A. B. Triggs, and S. Spink were elected Members.—Lord Granville exhibited a copper denarius of Faustina, wife of Constantine the Great, struck in London, also several base denarii of the Emperor Probus, from the Reichenstein "find." The latter were in very fine condition and still preserved their original coating of silver.—Mr. Prevost exhibited a medal of the London and Birmingham Railway, struck on its completion in 1838, and another commemorating the opening, in 1835, of the first railway in France, that between Paris and St. Germain.—Mr. A. E. Locke read a paper 'On the Coinage as affected by the Administration of Henry II.,' in which he gave extracts from the 'Dialogus de Scaccario' respecting the suppression of the currency of foreign coins in England and the provisions for a coinage of uniform type, early in that reign. After describing the state of the coinage at the beginning of the reign of Henry II., the author proceeded to discuss the status of the moneyers of that time and the regulations respecting their appointment.—Mr. L. A. Lawrence read a paper on a rare penny of Stephen and its relation to the so-called "Henry of Northumberland sterling." From the evidence afforded by this coin of Stephen, which is of the same type as those usually assigned to Henry of Northumberland, Mr. Lawrence questioned the correctness of the attribution of the latter pieces, and proposed to ascribe them instead to Henry, Count of Anjou and Duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—March 14.—Col. C. Swinhoe, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. W. Bateson, H. Carnocciolo, and G. C. Dudgeon, and the Rev. F. E. Lowe were elected Fellows.—Dr. D. Sharp exhibited a collection of white ants (Termites), formed by Mr. G. D. Haviland in Singapore, which comprised about twelve species, of most of which the various forms were obtained. He said that Prof. Grassi had recently made observations on the European species, and had brought to light some important particulars; and also that, in the discussion that had recently been carried on between Mr. Herbert Spencer and Prof. Weismann, the former had stated that in his opinion the different forms of social insects were produced by nutrition. Prof. Grassi's observations showed this view to be correct, and the specimens now exhibited confirmed one of the most important points in his observations. Dr. Sharp also stated that Mr. Haviland found in one nest eleven neotenic queens—that is to say, individuals having the appearance of the queen in some respects, while in others they are still immature; these neotenic queens were accompanied by kings in a corresponding state.—Mr. Haviland gave an account of the structure of some of the nests, and stated that two of the species of white ants exhibited certainly grow fungus for their use, as described by Smeathman, years ago, in the Philosophical Transactions.—Mr. H. Gosse remarked that the fact that the different forms of social insects were produced by nutrition was known to Virgil, who referred to it, and to the subject of parthenogenesis in bees, in the 'Georgics,' book iv.—Mr. McLachlan, Col. Swinhoe, Mr. Champion, Mr. Jenner-Weir, and Dr. Sharp continued the discussion.—Mr. O. E. Janson exhibited specimens of Dicranoccephalus adamsi, Pascoe, from Sze-chuen, Western China, and D. dabryi, Aus., recently received from the neighbourhood of Moupin, in the same district. He observed that, although the latter had been quoted by Lucas, Bates, and others, as a synonym of adamsi, the two species were perfectly distinct; the females of both were unknown to the authors when describing them, and presented a remarkable difference.—Mr. C. O. Waterhouse exhibited, for Mr. E. A. Waterhouse, a specimen of Colias edusa closely resembling C. erate, a continental species, taken on Wimbledon Common; a varied series of Chrysophanus phloxus, from Barnes Common; and a series of Lycæna arion, from Cornwall.—The Rev. Canon Fowler read a paper entitled 'Some New Species of Membracidae.'—Mr. F. Merrifield read a paper entitled 'Temperature Experiments in 1893 on several Species of Vaneuses and other Lepidoptera.' He said that the results tended to confirm Dr. Dixey's conclusions as to the origin of the wing-markings in the Nymphalidæ, and brought out many ancestral features. There was much difference in sensitiveness between the seasonal broods of the same species, even in V. calbum, although both broods of that species passed the pupal state in the warmer part of the year.—Dr. Dixey read a paper entitled 'On Mr. Merrifield's Experiments in Temperature-Variation as bearing on Theories of Heredity,' which was supplemental to the previous paper.—Col. Swinhoe, Mr. Hampson, Mr. Jenner-Weir, Mr. Merrifield, and Dr. Dixey took part in the discussion which ensued.

HISTORICAL.—March 15.—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Messrs. F. Curzon, W. F. Drew, and W. Wren.—A paper was read by Mr. E. Powell 'On Suffolk and the Villains' Insurrection,' based on the author's recent researches in the Public Record Office, the results of which will be published in the next volume of the Society's Transactions.—Mr. I. S. Leadam took part in the discussion which followed.

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 5.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. F. Stout read a paper 'On the Process of Attention.'

March 19.—The President in the chair.—Papers on the subject 'The Relation of Language to Thought' were read by Miss E. E. C. Jones, and Messrs. J. S. Mann and G. F. Stout.

HUGUENOT.—March 14.—Sir H. W. Peek, Bart., V.P., in the chair.—The Rev. R. R. Maugin, Mr. T. P. Lafanu, Mr. J. T. W. Perowne, and Mrs. Burbury were elected Fellows.—A paper was read by Mr. J. W. de Grave 'On the Registers of the Walloon Church at Southampton and the Churches of the Channel Islands.'

Scientific Society.

THE first annual soirée of the Royal Society (for gentlemen) is announced for Wednesday, May 2nd.

Two more small planets (probably raising the whole number known to 391) were discovered by M. Charlois at Nice, on the 7th and 8th inst. respectively.

It is stated in the current number of the Observatory that Sir Henry Thompson, the eminent surgeon, has offered the magnificent sum of 5,000*l.* to the nation, through the Astronomer Royal, for the purchase of a new telescope for the Greenwich Observatory. It is to be 26 in. in aperture, and to be expressly designed for photographic purposes.

We note with pleasure the appearance of the first number of the Oriente, a quarterly review devoted to Eastern topics, edited by the professors of the Royal Oriental Institute in Naples, and published in Rome. The opening number contains a short article by Signor L. Nocentini on the ancient intercourse between China and the nations of the West, a note by Signor Tagliabue on child-marriage in India, and a critical examination of the Babi religious movement in Persia by Signor Luigi Bonelli. There is also a goodly budget of minor articles and miscellaneous notes. We echo the hope of its conductors that the support vouchsafed to it may enable the new periodical to appear at monthly instead of quarterly intervals.

FINE ARTS

A Pictorial and Descriptive Record of the Origin and Development of Arms and Armour. By Edwin J. Brett. (Sampson Low & Co.)

THE student who takes up this sumptuously bound volume in the hope of learning something about arms and armour will, we fear, be disappointed. If glazed paper, gilt edges, and "ecclesiastical" red borders constitute a great work, then Mr. Brett's book may be so called; but the letterpress and illustrations, at any rate of the first part of the volume, fall far short of such elaborate accompaniments.

Apart from a brief preface and a table of contents, the work is divided into two parts: (1) an introduction of 120 pages; and (2) a series of 133 plates, with accompanying descriptions, of which "Plate 1 to plate 130, containing 1,000 engravings," a red silk marker informs us in letters of gold, "represent Mr. Edwin J. Brett's Private Collection of Ancient Arms and Armour."

It is somewhat difficult to understand how such an introduction can have been written by the owner of what is admitted by experts to be an exceedingly fine collection of arms and armour. It is divided into five sections: (1) a preliminary note on the introduction of armour and of chain-mail in particular; (2) a discourse on "The Chivalry of the Middle Ages"; (3) a collection of "Anecdotes of Chivalry"; (4) on tournaments; and (5) a description of "Ancient Arms and Armour used in War and Tournaments." The first four sections occupy 61 pages, and might, from their sketchy nature, have been written for the edification of schoolboys and other young persons, who would no doubt have been much interested in the puerile collection of "Anecdotes of Chivalry." In the fifth section Mr. Brett has missed a golden opportunity. He might have given us a really trustworthy essay on arms and armour, embodying the results of such workers as Way, Planché, Burges, the Baron de Cosson, and Lord Dillon, who have added so much to our knowledge since the days of Meyrick and Hewitt. But with the exception of a disparaging reference to Grose, not even a hint is vouchsafed us that any one has written on arms and armour before Mr. Brett. Such masterly essays as the 'Catalogue of the Exhibition of Ancient Helmets,' &c., published by the Royal Archaeological Institute, the Baron de Cosson's papers on 'Gauntlets' and 'English Military Effigies' in the Archæological Journal, and Lord Dillon's papers in Archæologia and elsewhere, are passed by unnoticed; and the whole history of ancient arms and armour, including a brief notice of the principal pieces of each class, is compressed into some sixty well-leaded pages, interspersed with large initial letters, a variety of illustrations, and a few anecdotes. This very superficial account betrays a curious want of knowledge of, and contempt for, the earlier arms and types of armour that are not represented in Mr. Brett's own collection. This may, perhaps, be explained by his own statement at the beginning of the section that "the arts, so far as sculpture and painting were concerned, were in the Middle Ages often at so low an ebb that it is extremely difficult to say with any degree of certainty what were the materials or the nature of the defences intended to be represented." As we gather from subsequent references that Mr. Brett's "Middle Ages" include at least the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, we are not surprised that he has so little to say about those periods for which effigies and pictures are the chief authorities.

The illustrations in the introduction are upon a level with the quality of the letterpress. The travesty of William Longespée's beautiful effigy shows him in a steel cap instead of a covering of mail, and one of the Temple effigies (here assigned to Robert, Earl of Essex, though shown with the arms of William the Marshal on his shield) is similarly altered. The four figures from the Temple Church on the opposite page are beneath notice, as is the representation of the Black Prince's tomb and effigy.

We notice that while Mr. Brett thinks it quite unnecessary to refer in any way to Hewitt's valuable work, he does not scruple to reproduce, by tracings or sketches, and in every case without acknowledgment, such of Hewitt's illustrations as he thinks useful. Amongst these are the modes of delineating garments and mail, &c. (placed upside down), and the representation of banded mail on p. 63; also a figure on p. 65, five on p. 66, five more on p. 70, one (fig. 33) on p. 75, and two on p. 82. The Black Prince's jupon on p. 75 and the Talbot effigy on p. 35 are copied from Stothard, also without acknowledgment; and Lord Berkeley's camail and mermaid collar (described as a standard of mail!), on p. 89, from Hollis.

From this trivial introduction we turn to the series of plates illustrating Mr. Brett's own collection. In addition to a complete equipment for man and horse, there are here figured thirty-one complete suits or demi-suits, besides about ten partly complete and various odd pieces of body armour, and an extensive series of shields, helmets, chaufriens, swords, daggers, and other weapons of all dates and shapes.

The most important feature in the collection is the early sixteenth century set of harness for man and horse, which Mr. Brett describes as perfect in all its details. The sword, however, looks later. Of the suits and demi-suits Mr. Brett possesses no examples earlier than about 1510, and about two-thirds of them belong to the first half of the sixteenth century, the remainder being Elizabethan and early seventeenth century. The helms, with one exception, are all of the Tudor and Stuart periods, and furnish a good series of examples of the principal varieties. The exception is one of the rare tilting helms of the fourteenth century, not unlike that over the Black Prince's tomb at Canterbury, but its genuineness may be open to question.

The swords are chiefly Italian and Spanish rapiers, most of them having beautifully wrought hilts. The collection also includes a number of German and Swiss two-handed examples, and an early sword which its owner claims to be of the end of the eleventh century. It appears rather to belong to the middle of the fourteenth.

The plates themselves are fairly satisfactory, but in several of the drawings of the suits the details of the helmets, which are shown on a larger scale, do not correspond with those given in the complete figure. These remarks especially apply to the perforations of the visors in plates 8, 9, 18, 21, 25, and 37. Such differences may be considered trifles, but they tend to diminish one's confidence in the accuracy and value of the plates. The accompanying letterpress briefly describes the salient features of the objects represented in the plates.

The book concludes with an index, which, so far as we have tested it, appears to be far from perfect. The Londesborough Collection is mentioned at least seven times in the work, but not once in the index; which also omits all reference to the Mgowo Collection. The omission also extends to names of persons, such as Sir Coutts Lindsay, Sir Seymour Fitzgerald, and Count Guyecki.

THE "Many Illustrations after J. C. Hook, R.A., H. Moore, R.A., Colin Hunter, A.R.A., Hamilton Macallum and other Artists" are presumably the raison d'être of The British Seas: Picturesque Notes, by W. Clark Russell and other writers (Seeley & Co.). Most of the pictures are good, some are charming, and the reproduction is generally more than respectable. Some of Mr. Ponnell's little bits of coast come out very well; the finer pictures by Henry Moore and Turner show to less advantage. As to the letterpress, about two-thirds of it is by Mr. Russell, and is marked by that florid word-painting which distinguishes and—for a reader of sober taste—spoils so much that Mr. Russell has written. Such a sentence, for instance, as—"The dim land of France hovering in a cerulean mirage above the snow-like gleam at the extremity of the horizon, gives a startling significance to the majestic natural walls of Dover"—is perilously apt to remind the reader of Antonio's question, "Is that anything now?" and with that, of Basanio's answer.

ASSYRIAN ANTIQUITIES.

33, Palace Gardens Terrace, Kensington, W.,
March 19, 1894.

WITH reference to the letter of Mr. Francis E. Whelan which appeared in your impression of the 17th inst., I think it would have been more to the point if your correspondent had induced the Trustees of the British Museum to properly inquire into the conduct of their employees, past and present, in regard to the Oriental archaeological researches, and into the circumstances which led to the existence of Assyrian and Babylonian antiquities in England, the continent of Europe, and America, whether in public institutions or private houses.

Perhaps your correspondent is not aware that formerly, after certain collections were acquired for the British Museum, duplicate and triplicate copies of certain sculptures and fragments of dilapidated bas-reliefs, which were not considered worth the expense of transporting, were abandoned, and it was left to the owners of the sites to do what they liked with them. From time immemorial the owners of the land were in the habit of digging for alabaster and marble slabs to burn for lime, and had I not managed to save the pieces which were not quite destroyed by the fire, they would have met with the same fate.

As for the reason that every piece or fragment of dilapidated sculpture was not acquired for the Museum, it was the business of the Trustees, and not mine, that only certain selections were made from Sir Henry Layard's and my discoveries.

I may here mention that I myself made no selections whatever.

NOTES FROM ITALY.

The chief interest and expectation of Tuscan archaeologists and of all Etruscologists in Italy are turned to the ever increasingly intricate question of Vetulonia. The solution of the old difficulties, which it was supposed had been at length afforded by the researches of which I spoke in a former letter—researches which resulted in the belief of the discovery of a new Vetulonia—seems now to be further off than ever. The identification of the new city and of its necropolises has been sharply contested by Prof. Gamurrini, and now a commission composed of many Italian archaeologists, to whom is added a competent geologist (Prof. Taramelli of Pavia), has been appointed by the Government for the purpose of visiting the site and making a fresh examination in order to determine the topographical bearing of the recent discoveries. Until those fresh deliberations are completed we must, then, hold our judgment in suspense.

The researches that have now been going on for several years in Eastern Sicily at Syracuse and in the neighbourhood still yield a rich harvest of results important for the history of art and for that of the Sicilian and Greek populations once settled in that district. In the large Greek necropolis called Del Fusco Dr. Orsi at the beginning of last summer resumed his excavations for a short period, directing them to a piece of land teeming with remains of tombs and burials. The tombs, all belonging to the Greek archaic epoch, were made, some by scooping out the rock, others by tiles joined together, while others again consisted of large vases or ossuaries. The grave goods discovered in this campaign, although not great in number, are remarkable, however, for their quality. Some of the vases are exceptionally fine, amongst them being a splendid large and uninjured proto-Corinthian ops, adorned with friezes of animals. Some of the large ossuaries are of the form of stamnoi of geometric style, resembling the dipylon. Of importance amongst other artistic objects is a small ivory counter, with a very archaic representation of Artemis Thuria. Some work was also done at a necropolis on Monte Finocchito, near Noto, which belongs to the so-called third Sicilian epoch, about which, up to four years ago, nothing whatever was known. The tombs had already been for the most part rifled by early predators in search of bronze. The relics now found enabled Dr. Orsi to form some idea of the state of civilization at that time, and to fix the date of the necropolis between the ninth and seventh centuries B.C. All the vases here obtained consist of local Greek ceramic work, of imported geometric vases, or else imitations of the latter manufactured on the spot. Amongst the bronzes left are numerous fibule of boat shape, and others of a serpent form, with rings of various forms and dimensions, three glazed scarabei, and two iron knives.

At Salemi in Western Sicily, in the province of Trapani, the remains of a small Christian church of the fourth or, at the latest, fifth century have been found levelled with the ground. Of the two pavements, one beneath the other, owing to restorations, the lower and more ancient one bears Greek inscriptions, while the upper and more recent one, of which very little remains, has some fragmentary inscriptions in Latin. It is to be hoped that further researches will be made on the site of what must have been one of the oldest Christian buildings in the island.

Fresh contributions to the study of the prehistoric settlements of Northern Italy have been furnished by the excavations of Prof. Pigorini in the terramara of Castellazzo di Fontanellato, near Parma. We are now well-nigh in possession of a complete plan of a prehistoric city, which, from the results of partial discoveries recently made, would appear to have been quadrilateral and oriented, having its sides more or less modified in direction in order to allow the water to run into the fosse that surrounded it. The interior of the settlement appears to have been really traversed from north to south by a decumanus, a particular which would confirm the conjecture of Prof. Chierici that in the terramara we have the prototypes of the first Italic cities. Parallel to the decumanus, and adjoining the eastern rampart, was discovered a large rectangular mound of earth, 120 metres in length and 60 in width, surrounded on all sides by a ditch 30 metres wide, just like the ditch running round the whole terramara. Spanning the western fosse are the remains of a bridge giving access from this raised platform to the centre of the city, and abutting on to the decumanus. The existence of this raised mound, which in the Castellazzo terramara is found for the first time, arouses the greatest interest. Prof. Pigorini is inclined to think it may be the temple or citadel, namely, a kind of arx or acropolis. Another important discovery has been made in one of the two necropolises—in that which lies at the south-east angle outside the enclosure, and is in the form of a square. The necropolis, like the city, is surrounded by a ditch and is formed of ground raised by means of piles. The city of the dead would appear in those times (if this circumstance is confirmed by other burial-grounds of the lake-dwellers) to have been an exact imitation of the city of the living, just as the tombs of the remotest ages of Greek and Italian civilization were exact imitations of the huts or dwellings of the living. This burial-place, as well as the other on the west side, which has been so far but little explored, was used for cremated bodies. Near the first is a piece of ground baked by the fire, which was evidently used as an ustrinum.

FREDERICK HALSHERR.

M. DE MORGAN'S EXCAVATIONS AT THE PYRAMID AT DACHOUR.

It has been known to Egyptologists that the energetic Director of the Ghizeh Museum, M. de Morgan, has been for some time past planning excavations at the brick pyramid of Dachour. Very interesting discoveries have been anticipated from the examination of the chambers contained in this monument, and we are glad to announce that these expectations will be amply realized. We have been favoured by the perusal of a letter, dated March 1st, from the learned Director, announcing his discoveries, which our readers will doubtless be gratified to see in the original:—

"Arrivé à Dachour depuis quinze jours environ, j'ai attaqué la fameuse pyramide de briques, qui jusqu'ici avait résisté à toutes les fouilles. J'ai pu surveiller de très près ces travaux et bien m'en a prié, car hier, 23 février, je suis entré dans le sanctuaire des morts.

"Déjà quatorze chambres funéraires et quatorze sarcophages sont visibles, mais un éboulement coupe la galerie principale. Il faut que je le passe avant de voir les autres chambres, qui probablement seront très nombreuses.

"Le tombeau du roi n'est pas dans la partie explorée hier, il est plus loin, mais j'ai la certitude de le rencontrer puisque je suis dans la place.

"Comme vous le savez, les pyramides ordinaires renferment un seul sarcophage et au plus deux chambres, construites dans l'épaisseur du monument.

"La pyramide de briques au contraire est massive et ne renferme rien. Les tombeaux sont creusés dans le rocher au dessous, et c'est par un puits que j'y suis descendu, mais là n'est pas la seule différence. L'intérieur est une véritable nécropole renfermant les tombeaux de toute la famille royale. Ces tombeaux donnent tous sur une galerie dont la partie déjà découverte est dirigée d'est en ouest."

Among the treasures found in one of the royal chambers is a pectoral in massive gold, 48 mm. high and 55 mm. long, and weighing 37½ grammes. In the centre of the pectoral is the cartouche of Ousertesen II. (twelfth dynasty); on either side are hawks, wearing the crown of Upper and Lower Egypt respectively. The signs of the cartouche are said to be composed of cornelian, lapis-lazuli, and turquoise, set into the gold (they will possibly be found to be of glass paste, as in other instances of the period). The same materials are employed in the rest of the ornamentation of the front of the object. The reverse bears similar decoration, except that the ornamentation is here incised only.

SALE.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 17th inst. the following pictures, from various collections: M. D. Hondelooster, Cocks Fighting, a hen and chickens and other birds in a landscape, 1891. Rembrandt, A Girl, in a rich dress, with muslin chemise, 1571. Rubens, Portrait of Anthony Trieste, Bishop of Ghent, 1691. W. Collins, The Ferry, 1731. G. Morland, A Mother and Child carrying Faggots, 1311. Titian, Ariadne in Naxos, 1051. Le Nain, The Tasting, five children gathered round their mother, 1101. A. Brauer, Figures on a Sandy Road, 1411. J. Van Goyen, The Ferry Boat, 1621. F. Hals, Portrait of a Man, half-length, 3251. J. Van der Heyden, A View in a Dutch Town, 4981. P. de Hooch, A Cavalier, smoking in an arbour, and a lady, in red dress, offering him a glass, 1051. Jan Steen, A Merry-Making, 5671. The Philistines making Sport of Samson, 2411. G. Five-Act Comedy.

"In San Francesco, without the gate of San Miniato, Fra Giovanni painted an Annunciation." Thus Vasari in his biography of Fra Angelico wrote, it is presumed, of that recent acquisition of the National Gallery which we mentioned last week, and, as this reference occurs soon after the account of the great 'Coronation of the Virgin,' now in the Louvre, it is probable Vasari thought that Sir F. Burton's purchase belongs to a date not long subsequent to that of that glorious production, a suggestion which its style at least partially confirms. Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle and other authorities mention the 'Annunciation' of San Francesco among the lost works of the painter. Marchese is silent about it. In some respects the design and accessories of the diptych (for such it is), which will shortly be exhibited to the public in Trafalgar Square, remind us of Angelico's incomparable 'Annunciation' at San Marco; but the Virgin in the former is a little plumper and less girlish, while, unlike the Gabriel of the convent, the Archangel is standing, and partly bending his knees before the Mother of Christ, whom he salutes, although he has not yet folded the wings of gold by help of which he has alighted in the vaulted cloister of stone supported on slender columns. On our right, in front, the Virgin, who wears her traditional colours, sits on a bench, and behind her is suspended a magnificent hanging of cloth of gold richly embroidered in an Oriental pattern of red. She bends forward slightly, as if to listen to the salutation of the Archangel, and, with one hand raised from her lap, so as to express her surprise, draws across her bosom the embroidered edge of the mantle of celestial blue which envelops her to the feet. Gabriel, who is on our left, is clad in a rose-coloured robe enriched with gold, and presses his crossed palms against his breast in token of profound humility, while his face shows that he is speaking. The Virgin's under garment is a close-fitting gown of very pale rose-colour, embroidered in a diaper of circles; her carnations, which are very fair and pure, and the light, honey-coloured tresses that float on her shoulders, belong to that chaste, girlish type of womanhood which the painter affected, but her figure is riper than is common in his pictures. Her finely drawn hands and tremulous lips are fuller of life than usual with him, and, while there is no lack of spirituality in her face, there is in it more of simple unidealized nature than the so-called "mystical artist" was wont to depict. Through an arched opening behind the Virgin we see a sort of cloister garth. There are daisies on the sward, and in a pot stands a tall lily. A similar opening behind the Archangel reveals another part of the garth, enclosed on all sides by a rose trellis. Beyond the trellis are visible a hill and a convent resembling that of San Miniato, rows of cypresses, and more distinct peaks in fuller light. The embroideries, the angel's plumage, and both the niabi are represented in real gold, while the last are incised in radial lines, so that, like the wings, their brilliance is distinct, and they shimmer in the light. The pictures are on separate panels, which were, as the continuing lines of the architecture and pavement indicate, originally joined edge to edge so as to form a diptych. On the capitals of two of the columns of the cloister the red annulets upon a silver shield of the Albizzi family are seen. Both works are in an excellent state of preservation, so that they require but little repair. Beyond the suggestion as to Vasari, all we at present know of their history is that they were brought to England in 1818 by Samuel Woodburn.

A renew of John Opie has presented to the National Gallery a very finely painted and sympathetically studied portrait—by the Academician, his relation—of a handsome and intelligent young man, being the head only, in three-quarters view to our right, and at life size. It is executed with more refinement and a lighter touch than were common with the artist, and is doubtless a likeness of Opie's younger brother, the father of the donor. Opie died in 1807. In Room XVIII. of the National Gallery visitors will find on a screen a very pleasant example of J. F. Lewis's art, entitled 'Edfour, Upper Egypt,' camels resting upon a mound of sand. In the foreground their driver lies asleep. In the distance is the city, with which some travellers are setting forth in the cool of the evening, while the afterglow pervades the scene and the last rays of the sun are reflected by some distant hills. The number of the picture is 1405.

SHORTLY will be published, and dedicated by special permission to Her Majesty, another splendidly illustrated volume on Persian ceramic art, by Mr. Henry Wallis, enriched with plates after drawings made for the purpose from specimens belonging to Mr. F. D.

Godman, who has done much to improve our knowledge of these long-neglected, but supremely beautiful relics. The first volume, our readers may remember, dealt with Persian vases of the twelfth century; the new one is concerned with the similar, but superior, and generally less injured tiles of the same epoch, the decorative motives of which evince a great advance in design. For their colour and design the tiles may fairly be considered the finest specimens of Oriental ceramic art, and the forthcoming volume is fully worthy of them, as it comprises forty chromo-lithographic plates by Mr. S. J. Hodgson, and numerous illustrations in the text by Mr. Wallis himself. The type is enclosed by ornamental borders printed in gold from the celebrated Persian manuscript of Nizami, which is one of the best treasures of the British Museum. The ornamental printing reflects high credit on Messrs. Taylor & Francis, who undertook that difficult task with honourable zeal, and carried it out successfully. Subscribers will obtain their copies in a few days.

THE Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings has caused the Curfew Tower at Barking to be surveyed, and has sent in a report to the Restoration Committee, stating in detail how the Society considers the tower should be repaired so as to preserve it without loss of interest; but, unfortunately, the Restoration Committee has replied that it does not agree with the Society, and that it has decided to "restore" the building. The tower forms the entrance gateway to the churchyard, and has two stories, the lower one being the entrance gateway, and the upper one a chamber containing on its east wall a most exceptionally interesting piece of sculpture of the Crucifixion, with St. Mary and St. John on either side. During the last few years the church has been partly "restored." All the dressed stonework of the church tower is now brand new, and consequently, like all thoroughly "restored" buildings, it has lost most of its interest. If funds are forthcoming, the Gateway Tower will, we suppose, share the same ignominious fate.

THE press view of the exhibition of the Birmingham Society of Artists, which contains a special collection of pictures and drawings by the late Frederick Walker and by Mr. J. W. North, took place on Thursday, March 22nd.

DR. DÖRPFELD, before bringing this season's excavations near the Phryx and Aresopagus to a close, made still another important discovery, viz., that of the site of the ancient Temple of Dionysus "en limnais," together with statues, reliefs, and inscriptions. These last speak of the worship of the god and of his rites, and of the ceremonies attending the reception of those who wished to form part of the sacred society of the Iobacchi (Ἰοβάκται). A large four-cornered altar bears on one side a sacrificial scene, in which may be seen a man preparing to kill a goat, while behind it stands an ox bound to an altar by the horns. On another side is seen a satyr dragging a ram by the horns, with a man standing near ready to fell it with a club, while behind is seen a maenad. A third face represents the figures of Dionysus, Pan, and a satyr, while the fourth bears a short inscription. The Eneakrounos, the site of which is now finally identified, was described by the ancients as near the Temple of Dionysus in Aigais and the Odeum, and Dr. Dörpfeld has discovered the remains of a building which may well be the Odeum. All that has been found lately belongs, generally speaking, to the second or third century of our era; but amongst the sculptures there is a head of King Attalos, which is much more ancient. The longest of the inscriptions found at the same time gives us a name of a now eponymous archon called Epaphroditus. The works are now suspended for want of funds.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

QUEEN'S HALL.—The Bach Choir.

THE valuable association now directed by Prof. Villiers Stanford performed a duty worthy of the position it occupies in the estimation of musicians by presenting Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion Music, with the original German text, at its second concert this season on Thursday last week. The great work was given almost in its entirety, only two or three solos being omitted. The performance lasted four hours, which is far too long, having regard to the conditions to which suburban amateurs have to submit; and it was surprising that a large proportion of the immense audience remained to the close. There was further evidence of a desire to give the work as nearly as possible in accordance with the composer's intentions, the proportion of wood-wind to strings being more than usual, the former numbering twenty-four and the latter forty-four players. We feel constrained to add, however, that a great deal of nonsense is preached concerning a "composer's intentions." A sensible musician writes for the resources he has at command, but he would be frequently glad to write parts for other instruments if they were at his disposal. For example, a small country town may possess a little orchestra of strings, two flutes, and a cornet, and a cantata written for performance in the place would be arranged accordingly, with, perhaps, a reed organ in addition. But the composer would be only too pleased to avail himself of a more satisfactory orchestra whenever it happened to be available. It is neither possible nor desirable to perform the works of the Handel and Bach period precisely as they were written and heard by these masters, though, of course, an endeavour might be made to do so from time to time as a curiosity. But in the ordinary course judicious use should be made of the modern improvements in orchestration, leaving every revision of a score to be criticized on its own merits. This may sound like heresy, but we venture to think it is common sense. Reverting to last week's performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion Music, it may be said that there was much worthy of commendation, though unqualified praise cannot be bestowed. The choir was certainly not heard to such advantage as at many former concerts given by the society. The attack was for the most part feeble, and the volume of tone singularly small. Perhaps the singers were embarrassed by having to sing in a foreign tongue. Herr Robert Kaufmann, who appeared as the Evangelist, on the whole justified his engagement. He is regarded in Germany as the best living exponent of the part, and he certainly possesses a voice suitable for the interpretation of the music, which lies in great measure beyond the range of an ordinary tenor. Herr Kaufmann's organ is very light in quality, though the production is not the same as that of the English male alto, and, moreover, he sings with the intelligence and expression which the rôle of the Narrator demands. Miss Fil-lunger and Miss Marie Brema were efficient, and special praise is due to Mr. David Bispham for his earnest delivery of the minor bass parts. That excellent artist Mr. Norman Salmond was, unfortunately, very hoarse, and unable to render justice to himself in the music allotted to the Redeemer. Mention should be made of the services of Herr Joachim in the violin obbligati and of Miss Hélène Dolmetach in the part for the viola da gamba. The 'St. Matthew' Passion Music is to be repeated next season.

Musical Gossip.

THE Crystal Palace Concert last Saturday consisted of a performance of Gounod's 'Redemption,' which was largely attended and was in the main artistically successful. The Sydenham choir has certainly never been heard under better conditions, the dramatic choruses of the French master being given with admirable power and precision. Messrs. Edward Lloyd and David Bispham were the most commendable of the solo vocalists, but a second bass should have been engaged for the subsidiary parts.

MENTION must now be made concerning the last two Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts for the present season. On Saturday last the programme included Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, Op. 95; three movements from Spohr's Duo Concertante in D, for violins, Op. 67, No. 2, in which Herr Joachim was joined by Lady Halle; and Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in A flat, Op. 97. Mr. Leonard Borwick deserves thanks for playing Mozart's masterly Sonata in D, ordinarily termed No. 21, for the pianoforte works of the composer of 'Don Giovanni' are now undeservedly neglected; and Miss Gwladys Wood gave satisfaction as the vocalist in place of Miss Dale, who was incapacitated from appearing by illness.

A REASON more than ordinarily successful, by reason of the proportion of new works and the patronage received by Mr. Arthur Chappell, came to a conclusion with much effect on Monday evening. Of the presentation to Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti at the Grafton Galleries on Thursday we must speak next week; but Monday's concert enabled about 1,500 admirers of these artists to bestow their congratulations on the fiftieth anniversary of their first appearance in London. The event is unique, and it is worthy of permanent record. Concerning Monday's programme there is little to be said. Mendelssohn's Quintet in A flat, Op. 87, and Schumann's in E flat, Op. 44, were the principal items. Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mr. Leonard Borwick were extremely well associated in M. Saint-Saëns's masterly variations for two pianofortes on a theme from Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 31, No. 3. Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti played solos by Brahms and Veracini respectively; and Mr. Bispham was strikingly successful in vocal pieces by Brahms, Schumann, and Wagner.

THE sixty-seventh performance of the Musical Artists' Society was given in St. Martin's Town Hall on Monday evening. The programme included Miss Llewella Davies's excellent Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in A, played at a recent Royal Academy concert; and a String Quartet in A flat, Op. 40, by Miss Marie Wurm, containing some effective writing, though not altogether satisfactory as regards form.

THE programme of the concert at the Royal College of Music on Thursday last week included Schumann's Quartet in A minor, No. 1; Brahms's Sextet in A flat, Op. 18; and a Larghetto for violin and harp, by N. von Wilm.

THE Royal Academy of Music continues in a condition of prosperity, and the orchestral concert in St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon was successful. Highly satisfactory promise was shown by Miss Lily West as a pianist in Grieg's A minor Concerto, and by Miss A. M. E. Carnes as a harpist in an interesting Concerto-stück in C minor by N. von Wilm, a composer scarcely known in this country. The orchestra played with precision Beethoven's Overture to 'Egmont,' and the female choir sang remarkably well the clever and pretty chorus 'Whither away,' from Prof. Stanford's cantata 'The Voyage of Maeldune.'

NOTICE of all performances later than Tuesday last must necessarily be reserved until next week.

MR. ELLIOT STOKES announces for early publication a new work entitled 'Chapters on Church Music,' by Mr. R. B. Daniel.

AMONG English composers Mr. F. H. Cowen appears to be the most popular in Germany, which is, perhaps, rather surprising, as his music is for the most part dainty and fanciful, and certainly less solid and Teutonic in character than that of some other prominent composers of British birth. We learn that Mr. Cowen had a gratifying success at a concert of the Liszt Verein at Leipzig on Friday last week. His Symphony in F, No. 6, and his suite 'The Language of Flowers' were received with enthusiasm, and he also won much commendation as conductor.

THE great success of the Wagner cycle at Munich last year has led to arrangements being made for a repetition on a more extended scale during the ensuing autumn. Four complete representations will be given of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' four of 'Die Meistersinger,' and five of 'Tristan und Isolde.' The series will commence on August 8th and will terminate on October 3rd.

THE Royal Philharmonic Academy of Rome have conferred the compliment of honorary membership on Sir Herbert Oakeley, who recently opened the new English organ in that city.

AT La Scala, Milan, where the success of 'Die Walküre' was jeopardized by a ridiculous mise en scène, improvements have been effected, and the work was given a dozen times last month to full and enthusiastic audiences.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

COMEDY.—Afternoon Representation: 'Frou-Frou's Play in Five Acts. Translated from Molière and Halévy.

IT is pleasant to meet with an English actress capable of playing Frou-Frou. Until the appearance of Miss Emery in the part such had not been found. Gilberte Brigard is, indeed, the most essentially Parisian character in dramatic fiction, as much a type as is in prose fiction Manon Lescaut. Little corresponding to Parisian frivolity is supposed to prevail in the more sedate matronhood of England, and the same species of gravity and responsibility that provoked the gibe of the foreigner, that to an Englishwoman a fan is luggage, has prevented her success in a character moulded upon, and first acted by, Desclée. Not only has Miss Emery got inside the character of Frou-Frou, she has read into it intentions which neither Desclée nor her more brilliant, but scarcely in the part more delightful or more competent, successor was able to grasp. Her invective against Louise has thus, in addition to the petulance and intensity with which it has always been charged, a species of unreasoning hatred, amounting almost to ferocity, which is quite convincing. We feel that her suspicions are not wholly unfounded, and that the attitude of self-sacrifice which Louise has so carefully studied is a little too sublime to win full acceptance. The purpose of Louise is to serve as a foil for Gilberte, and this purpose is generally accentuated on the stage by dressing her as a matron rather than a girl, and not seldom even as a dowdy. Gilberte is justified in using her as she will, and the sisterly venom of the latest Frou-Frou furnishes proof also of sisterly perspicacity. One aspect, at least, of Frou-Frou Miss Emery realizes incomparably. A certain plaintive air of self-pity characterizes unconsciously much of Miss Emery's acting. The idea generally that the burden is almost beyond her powers is conveyed. This suits exactly the character of Frou-Frou when she realizes that life is serious, that her own whims can no longer be accepted as pleasant tricks of childhood, and that bloodshed and death wait upon her indulgence of her caprice. Her very last words are: "Frou-Frou, pauvre Frou-Frou." It is impossible to assign the English translation of these words more truth and fidelity than Miss Emery conveys. Not less happy is she in the passionate pleading to her husband when she finds that one or other of her lovers must die; and the horror at realizing that her fall is past redemption, and that the presence of his mother at the death-bed of the man who dies for her amounts to her own banishment, is finely conveyed. These things were known to be within the reach of Miss Emery, and success in them was a mere matter of degree. Few, however, expected that she would assign the comedy scenes so much brightness and witchery. The performance is not faultless. It is, none the less, so good as to hold out promise of perfection and to show the capacity of Miss Emery to play an entire range of characters which hitherto she has not essayed. Mr. Cyril Maude's Brigard is an excellent cabinet picture; Mr. Brandon Thomas as Sartorys is robust; and Mr. H. B. Irving's love-making as Valréas is impassioned, but scarcely persuasive.

THE ninth volume of the plays of Mr. Pinero consists of the three-act farce of The Schoolmistress, ushered in as usual, though at less length than usual, by an introduction by Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman. This buoyant piece, given at the Court, March 27th, 1886, under the joint management of John Clayton and Arthur Cecil, constitutes very whimsical reading. One remembers well the Vere Queckett of Mr. Cecil, Mr. Clayton's fiery admiral, Mrs. John Wood's irresistible Miss Dyott, and Miss Norreys's Peggy Heesleridge. Ah! would the actresses last named only play such characters now! Not the best of Mr. Pinero's farces is this. It merits, however, a place in his collected plays.

Dramatic Gossip.

So many theatres have been closed during the past week that the task is easier of saying which houses have been opened than which have been shut. Practically, the principal West-End houses at which the entertainment is purely dramatic, as apart from musical, have suspended performance, the prominent exceptions being the Adelphi and the Princess's, both popular houses. 'Charley's Aunt' at the Globe and 'The New Boy' at Terry's are too successful to admit of any interruption of the run, and Toole's has been shut only on the last three nights of the week. The Gaiety is, of course, open, but the performances there are neither fish nor flesh, neither drama nor music.

FOLLOWING the example set them at Drury Lane, the actors in the pantomime at the Lyceum marked the closing night of the performance by a presentation of plate to the manager. In both cases the tribute was well earned. Is it not, however, setting a dangerous precedent, and may not the actors find that they are imposing on themselves what may become a burden?

A COMEDY by Mr. George Bernard Shaw will, it is said, be given at the Avenue at the close of the run of Dr. Todhunter's 'Comedy of Signs.'

MR. IRVING's tour in America closed on Saturday last at the Tremont Theatre, Boston, and the actor started for home on Wednesday.

GERHART HAUPTMANN, according to a Berlin paper, has settled for some time at Meriden, in Connecticut, where he is busy at his historical play 'Florian Geyer.'

THE REPUBLIC as a FORM OF GOVERNMENT; Or, the Evolution of Democracy in America.

By JOHN SCOTT, of Farquhar.

Post 8vo. pp. 328, 7s. 6d.

We have in this book a criticism by one of the citizens of the government of the United States. It invites attention now when a change is threatened in the British Constitution which would turn it into a Republic. It may be well to look before we leap. The author says of his work:—'It is an examination into the working and principle of the government of the United States. A humble contribution to safe government which a democratic revolution endangers the stability of Europe.'—Extract from the Introduction.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW LIBRARY NOVELS.

By R. E. Francillon.—JACK DOYLE'S DAUGHTER. 3 vols.By G. A. Henty.—DOROTHY'S DOUBLE. 3 vols."The plot is laid down and developed with a skill that makes every page of the three volumes light and entertaining. The book is eminently readable."—Scotsman.By John Hill.—THE COMMON ANCESTOR. 3 vols."From the point of view of the subscriber to the circulating library this is an almost ideal novel. It can be run through quickly, but without skipping, and amusement is to be found on every page. Mr. Hill's style is excellent, easy without being careless, always light, but never trifling. He has a nice sense of humour too. We would that all novels were filled with such light, wholesome, and easily digested stuff."—Daily Chronicle.By E. Lynn Linton.—THE ONE TOO MANY. 3 vols. Second Edition."Mrs. Linton's best characters have a singular vitality of their own, and in 'The One too Many' Effie Chagwin stands out as a heroine who is real flesh and blood. The novel is a living and exceedingly powerful and moving piece of work, and it is written with that telling force of style of which the authoress has the secret."—Woman.By D. Christie Murray.—IN DIREST PERIL. 3 vols."In 'Direst Peril' displays the attractions of a plausible plot, stirring action, and strong human interest. A powerful and brightly written story, rife with thrilling incident, and cleverly worked up to a dramatic dénouement which has the indisputable merit of thorough originality. From its first page to its last, 'In Direst Peril' is an eminently entertaining and fascinating book."—Daily Telegraph.By W. E. Norris.—SAINT ANN'S. 2 vols.

[Shortly.]

By Mrs. Campbell Praed.—CHRISTINA CHARD. 3 vols.

BARBARA DERING.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

BY EDWIN LESTER ARNOLD.

The CONSTABLE of ST. NICHOLAS.With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.
"Mr. Arnold has been happily inspired in his new book. The story is extremely well told, equally dramatic in its construction and its exposé on coils. It is a book which one can read at a sitting, and in which the interest is strongly maintained from the first page to the last."—Daily Telegraph.

BY GRANT ALLEN.

The SCALLYWAG. With 26 Illustrations byJacobus Hood.
"Clear character-sketching, bright dialogue, and a hundred clever hints at topics of the day will make the time spent in its perusal pass pleasantly enough."—Speaker.

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

RED DIAMONDS.

"In point of plot and closeness of construction by far the most remarkable of Mr. McCarthy's works of fiction. What surprises is, a bold and original conception, and the working out of plot and character to a highly dramatic issue, after a fashion which no deliberately sensational novelist has surpassed."—World.

BY BRET HARTE.

A PROTÉGÉE of JACK HAMLIN'S, &c.

With 26 Illustrations.
"Mr. Bret Harte's latest collection of stories is redolent of the shrewd humour and unaffected pathos, the artistic alternation and judicious contrast which imparted such a fascinating interest to the very earliest works of this illustrious romancer. In the story which gives his new volume its title, Mr. Harte is at his best, and what can be better? Of the other stories, one and all delightful reading, perhaps the most subtly charming is the beautiful 'The Mystery of the Hacienda,' which closes the series."—Daily Telegraph.

BY R. E. FRANCILLON.

A DOG and HIS SHADOW.

BY ERNEST GLANVILLE.

A FAIR COLONIST. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.

"A fair colonist" is really a very good story of the adventures of a well-written, full of incident and variety. Moreover, the South African novelist seems somehow to succeed in giving us a local colour which is pleasantly removed from the 'word-painting' of the ordinary novelist."—Western Mail.

BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

The GUN-RUNNER: a Romance of Zululand.With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.
The LUCK of GERARD RIDGELEY: a Tale of the Zulu Border. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.

The KING'S ASSEGAI: a Matabili Story.

With 6 Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood.

"The King's Assegai" is an admirable example of the tale in which the courage, cruelty, and superstitions of a savage race replace the more features of the ordinary novel. No lover of stories of this order should leave 'The King's Assegai' unread."—Speaker.

BY ALLEN UPWARD.

The QUEEN against OWEN. With a Frontis-piece by J. S. Groom.
"An unimpeachable success. Regarded simply as a story, we have not for a long while read anything more intensely dramatic. It would compel notice for the mere manner of its telling. Not often has an author who has boldly departed from the traditional line of the writer of fiction, so completely vindicated his method. There is high quality in this book, with its vivid glimpses of life, and its clever characterization. Altogether, a notable book, and if its popularity be at all commensurate with its merits, then it will have a great vogue."—Sun.TWO OFFENDERS. By OUIDA, Author of 'Under Two Flags,' &c. Large 8vo. cloth extra, 6s."The two little tragedies which compose this volume would not have been unworthy of Guy de Maupassant, to whom it is dedicated. They are striking in conception and simple in execution and accessories. It must be acknowledged that Ouida has never written more artistic stories than these."—Times.

Opinions of the Press.
Daily Chronicle—"This is a powerful and serious piece of work. Mr. Rilla has drawn a man... It is written with much nerve and go."
Daily Telegraph—"The Beauty of Boscastle" is a strong story. It is an unusually readable book."
Morning Post—"The book has some rather strong scenes and good word pictures of the Cornish coast."
Star—"There is a curious blending of the very real with the fanciful in 'The Beauty of Boscastle'... The book is distinctly above the average."
The Freeman says—"There is not a dull page in the story. The Literary World says—"It is distinctly interesting. The Pictorial Circular says—"Mr. Rilla knows well how to tell a story. 'The Beauty of Boscastle' is a successful novel."
 Various other Newspapers say—"Decidedly amusing." "Full of thrilling interest." "The author's power of depicting character and analysing motives is certainly beyond the average." "Compulsively and thrillingly told." &c.

"One of the hits of the season."—Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR in the Weekly Sun, Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

A BOOK OF STRANGE SINS.

THIRD EDITION.

By COULSON KERNAHAN.

The Daily Chronicle says:—"We know of nothing published during recent years which in lurid impressiveness and relentless veracity of rendering is to be compared with the study entitled 'A Literary Gent.'"

Academy.—"Such books are among the healthiest symptoms not only of modern literature, but of modern thought. They are on the crest of the wave, whether we regard them from the artistic or the ethical standpoint. Mr. Kernahan's plummet essays to sound the very depths of the human soul. His book is a fine one, and I think it will live."

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P., in the Weekly Sun.—"I do not remember to have read for a long time a study of the deadliness to soul and body of what I may even call the murderesses of purely sensual passion. In which the moral is so finely and, I must use the word, awfully conveyed. One of the hits of the season. I am not surprised."

Sketch.—"The daring freshness of his thought, his great ability in expressing it, his contempt for common tradition, the sincerity which exudes from every page of his work, captivate the reader. I do not know any piece of prose which opens up so many great questions in so few lines as the story 'A Lost Soul,' nor one which is more forcibly realistic and impressive than 'The Apples of Sin.'"

Illustrated London News.—"The whole of the dogmatic theologians must equip themselves for a contest with one who has such a potent individuality when discussing the tremendous question he grapples with in 'A Book of Strange Sins'; but the liberal thinker and the poet will hail Mr. Kernahan as a brother."

Daily Chronicle.—"A writer possessing not only a fine literary gift, and a marvellous power of intense emotional realization, but a free, strange, and fascinating imaginative outlook."

NEW WORK BY MACKENZIE BELL.

Now ready, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

SPRING'S IMMORTALITY; and other Poems.

By MACKENZIE BELL.

Athenaeum.—"Has an unquestionable charm of its own."

Academy.—"There are poems in this volume which will bring light and cheer to many a drooping spirit. There are others—namely 'The Taking of the Flag' and 'The Keeping of the Vow'—that will be read with pleasure for the vigour with which they are written. And there are others—more particularly, perhaps, the sonnets—on which readers will dwell with the delight which thoughtful verse, the genuine outcome of true feeling, never fails to give. Mr. Bell thinks his own thoughts, and expresses them in his own style and language."

Daily News.—"Throughout a model of finished workmanship and of that perfect sanity of the imagination which is the mark of all our best work in this department of literature."

Review of Reviews.—"This graceful little volume. . . . One or two of the poems in the 'Pictures of Travel' section are, owing to the very great success with which the details of natural beauty are treated, really notable; while the religious poems breathe an atmosphere of sincerity and devotion not a little refreshing."

Bookman.—"Verse like Mr. Mackenzie Bell's is sufficiently rare, and should be valued. These selections from former volumes and some new poems give one not a little pleasure. . . . His verse leaves on us the impression that we have been in company with a poet."

JOSEPH HOCKING'S WORKS.

NEW VOLUME.

The MONK of MAR-SABA. A Romance of the Wilderness of Judea. With Frontispiece and Vignette. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Some years ago, when visiting Palestine, it was Mr. Hocking's fortune to spend some time near the convent of Mar-Saba, so well as to visit the convent itself and to learn the rumour, habits and beliefs of the monks. What he has written in the story relating to those things is true to fact. The grim, shaggy buildings, the great gorges, the daily hills, the weird surroundings, all exist, while the life of the monks, those dead men who walk and see, is faithfully portrayed.

ISHMAEL PENGELLY: an Outcast. With Frontispiece and Vignette by W. S. Stacey. NOW READY, crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"A remarkable novel. The plot of the story is ingenious, the manner of its telling essentially dramatic, the character drawing excellent and consistent."—Christian World

The STORY of ANDREW FAIRFAX. With Frontispiece and Vignette by Geo. Hutchinson. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"His scenes and characters are drawn with free broad touches without Mr. Hawthorne's artificiality, and, if we may venture to say it, with more realism than in Mr. Hardy's country pictures."—Manchester Evening News

JABEZ EASTERBROOK: a Religious Novel. With Frontispiece and Vignette. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"A book that can be read with interest and profit. A clever story, cleverly told."—Record

ZILLAH: a Romance. With Frontispiece and Vignette. SECOND EDITION. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

"Written with considerable vigour."—Manchester Guardian

"The interest, as the plot unfolds, is thrilling."—Book

ELRAD the HIC: a Romance of the Sea of Galilee.

FOURTH THOUSAND. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

Readers who want a story original in style and with a strong human interest, who are seeking for a tale which is told with straightforward strength, and which, while faithfully outspoke and sincere, is before all things high and pure in tone, would do well to try the books of Mr. Joseph Hocking. Mr. Hocking has the rare art of interesting his readers, and of penning vigorous and graphic descriptions. He writes always from the Christian standpoint, and never sways from his steadfast allegiance to the New Testament, but he is a man who thinks, who keeps abreast of the times, and who looks the question of the day fully and fearlessly in the face. For young men, and for family reading, his books may be confidently recommended. They are full of life and "go," but their aim and tendency is, first and foremost, high, healthy, and good.

Just ready, strongly bound, 6s.

RECTORIAL ADDRESSES delivered at the UNIVERSITY of ST. ANDREWS, 1863-1893, Sir WILLIAM STIRLING-MAX-WELL to the MARQUIS of BUTE. Edited, with an Introduction, by WILLIAM KNIGHT,

 LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy, University of St. Andrews. Demy 8vo. price 10s. 6d.

"This is a volume that will be treasured by alumni of St. Andrews whosoever the fates may have borne them.
 It will revive sunny memories of days departed, and vividly recall scenes that time has obscured but not obliterated."
Dundee Advertiser.

"The volume is both valuable and attractive, and it is got up in a style worthy of the 'City of the Scarlet Gown,' of which it is meant to be a memorial."—Scottsman.

"Besides being of special interest to all whose student days are recalled by them, appeal more generally to those who wish to understand the aims and ideals of our Scottish universities during the latter half of the nineteenth century."
Glasgow Herald.

A NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.
A MODERN HERETIC.
 THE STORY OF A SCHISMATIC.
 A NOVEL WITH A PURPOSE.
 Crown 8vo. cloth, Five Shillings.

Dr. R. F. Hutton says:—"A most merry, wholesome, sunny book it has not been my lot to read from any of our living authors. In addition to the humour, there is a constantly recurring felicity of phrase which reminds one of George Meredith."

Graphic Herald:—"A very remarkable and distinguished book. The author has done for the (infant) of 1880 something like what Mrs. Humphrey Ward did for the (infant) of a later generation, but in place of a revolt from Christianity we have only a revolt from Anglicanism as the momentary type of the search after truth, and thus we are spared such a portentous endeavour as the New Brotherhood."

James Clarke & Co. 13 and 14, Fleet-street, London.

Seventh Edition, with Additions, price 1s. post free.

NOSE AND THROAT DISEASES. By GEORGE MOORE, M.D. Revised by Dr. LENOX MOORE.
 London: James Nispe & Co. Limited, 170, Fleet-street, and 41, Threadneedle-street.

New and Cheaper Edition, price Two Shillings.

CELESTIAL MOTIONS: a Handy Book of Astronomy. Eighth Edition. With 3 Plates. By W. T. LYNN, M.A. F.R.S.

"Has, we are glad to see, reached an eighth edition, which enables this excellent introduction to the facts of astronomy to be brought up to date."—Guardian.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

NOTES AND QUERIES FOR DECEMBER 10th and 20th, 1893, and JANUARY 7th and 21st, 1894, contains a BIBLIOGRAPHY OF MR. GLADSTONE.

Price of the Four Numbers, is 4s.; or free by post, is 6d.

John C. Francis, Notes and Queries Office, Brewer's buildings, Chancery-lane, E.C.

In preparation, to be published very shortly.

HADDEN'S HANDBOOK to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1894.

Being a Complete and Practical Guide to the above Act and its Incorporated Amendments, with Full Text, Explanations, and Copious Index.

Companion Volume to 'The Councils' Handbook,' by H. H. HADDEN and J. H. KID.

(Published by order of the Local Government Act, 1894.)

It will be remembered that the principal Author of the 'Councils' Handbook was Mr. H. H. Hadden, who at the time was Private Secretary to the then President of the Local Government Board. Hadden, Esq. & Co. have been fortunate in securing for the present work the services of a gentleman who from his official position, has throughout his career, and particularly during the last twelve months, had his mind steeped in every branch of the subject, but who by the rules of the Civil Service, is prevented from publishing his name. It is & Co. have no hesitation in anticipating that the same "official value" will attach to the present work as to its companion.

HADDEN'S HANDBOOK to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1894, will deal very thoroughly with the Constitution, Election, and Proceedings of Parish Meetings, Parish Councils, District Councils, and Boards of Guardians under the Act, and the powers conferred upon them.

Particular attention will be given to the provisions of the Act, and to the extensive powers which District Councils will have for the purpose of giving effect to its provisions.

The work will be written, so far as the subject will permit, in technical language, and will be provided with a Full and Complete Index. The price will be 7s. 6d.

Hadden, Esq. & Co., West Harding-street, London, E.C.

W. C. BENNETT'S POEMS.

The GOLDEN LIBRARY—Square 8mo. cloth, 2s.
 SONGS for SAILORS.

Morning Post:—"Sprightly, melodious, and vigorously graphic."

Daily News:—"Very sprightly."

Anti Mail Gazette:—"Really admirable."

Morning Advertiser:—"Sure of a wide popularity."

John Bull:—"Very successful."

Evening News:—"Full of incident and strongly expressed sentiment, and having a simple, dashing, musical roll and movement that reminds us of some songs that are familiar to all sailors, and the touch of humour he introduces are precisely of the kind that they will relish."

Graphic:—"We may truly say that Dr. Bennett has taken up the mantle of Dittie."

Edinburgh:—"Dr. Bennett's heart is thoroughly in his work... All sprightly and vigorous. There is a healthy, manly, fresh-air dash about them which ought to make them popular with the class for whom use and pleasure they are designed."

Nonconformist:—"These songs bear a true literary mark, and give out the genuine ring."

Literary World:—"It seeks to quicken the pulse of our national life. It is to be hoped these sprightly songs will be sung in all parts of the world by our gallant tars, northward south, eastward west, wherever, in short, the Union Jack floats proudly over the sea. We heartily commend Dr. Bennett's 'Songs for Sailors' to the public at large."

Mirror:—"With admirable felicity he embodies national sentiments and emotions which stir the hearts of the people."

Leeds Mercury:—"There is no one nowadays who can compete with Dr. Bennett as a popular song-writer. In his volume of our songs we find the qualities which most secure its success."

Liverpool Post:—"Dr. Bennett has devoted his lyrical powers to a noble object in his comprehensive yet limited work. This gem deserves to be patronised not only by our noble Royal Navy, but by all our sailors' homes and all our Mercantile Marine Associations."

Echo:—"These songs are literally written for sailors, and they are precisely the kind of songs that sailors most enjoy."

Metropolitan:—"Instinct with patriotism."

Illustrated London News:—"Right well done."

News of the World:—"There is real poetry in these songs."

BARABBAS.

By MARIE CORELLI.

The FOURTH, FIFTH, and SIXTH EDITIONS were exhausted on publication. A SEVENTH EDITION is now ready.

BARABBAS:

A DREAM OF THE WORLD'S TRAGEDY.

By MARIE CORELLI,

Author of 'A Romance of Two Worlds.'

SEVENTH and CHEAPER EDITION.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

Mrs. Corelli's new romance has been received with much disapprobation by the secular papers, and with warm welcome by the religious papers. By the former she has been accused of blasphemy and bad taste; "a gory nightmare"; "a hideous travesty"; "grotesque vulgarization"; "unworthy of criticism"; "vulgar redundancy"; "sickening details"—these are some of the secular flowers of speech.

BARABBAS.

By MARIE CORELLI.

"By the dignity of its conceptions, the reserve around the Central Figure, and the fine imagery of the scene and circumstance, it has a likeness to the Ammergau Play, with the introduction of more modern problems and suggestions. Not a single word beyond the Scripture utterances is placed in the mouth of the Redeemer, while the Blessed Virgin is treated in a wholly ideal way. The studies of character are very striking. There is much that is elevating and devout in this remarkable literary work."—Guardian.

BARABBAS.

By MARIE CORELLI.

"Marie Corelli has too much reverence and artistic feeling to degrade the ideal of mankind. A glorious mystery surrounds the Son of Man in her pages, as in those of the first Church historians. Her characters move, not as puppets, but as men and women, instinct with life, warm with passion. The best proof of the success of 'Barabbas' is that, in spite of its free handling of generally received facts, it is interesting to the end. It is human, broad-based on the rock of our common nature, appealing to what is best in it, and fashioned by an artist hand."

Illustrated Church News.

BARABBAS.

"A book which teems with faith without any appearance of irreverence."

DAVE'S SWEETHEART.

By MARY GAUNT.

2 vols. 21s.

"In every respect one of the most powerful and impressive novels of the year."—Daily Telegraph.

DAVE'S SWEETHEART.

"Essentially a strong book. The writer has a wonderfully clean way of describing the elemental facts of life, and lets her plummet line go down deep into the depths of the sea of human tears. The book is of interest down to the last line."—Tablet.

DAVE'S SWEETHEART.

"The narrative is throughout animated and rises occasionally to heights of great dramatic power, whilst the picture of life in the diggings is delineated in a way that compels admiration."

Weekly Sun.

DAVE'S SWEETHEART.

"The action is rapid and well developed, the incidents exciting, as becomes the nature of the subject, and the human interest unusually deep."

SECOND EDITION.

NEW STORY,
THE RAIDERS:

BEING SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF JOHN FAA, LORD AND EARL OF LITTLE EGYPT.

BY

S. R. CROCKETT,

Author of 'The STICKIT MINISTER,' &c.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

*. The First Large Edition having been exhausted on the day of publication, a Second Edition has been prepared.

"The new Barrie of yesterday is to-day a second Stevenson—and no bad second, let us make haste to add.....Mr. Crockett writes exceedingly well—crisply, vividly, and above all readably. His Scotch is delightful and frequent, though somewhat capriciously distributed parenthetical translations smooth the thistly path for the Southron. He has a keen sense of humorous character."

Daily Chronicle.

"It is safe to say that this tale of the Galloway of the early part of last century will bring Mr Crockett at a bound into the front rank of those writers of the day who may be said to have founded among them a new school of Scottish romance. 'The Raiders' is alive and throbbing with the Gallowegian spirit; the strong and wholesome air of the hills and seas of the Stewartry blows through it."—Scotsman.

"The book has merits: merits of humour, character, description, dialects."—National Observer.

"Mr. Crockett has written a very able, original and stirring Scots romance."—Glasgow Herald.

"The wild Solway smugglers, already famous in fiction, live again in Mr. Crockett's pages, the hillmen and gypsies rob and reive, the law-abiding citizens hunt them down, and there is a rapid succession of stirring adventures on sea and land. The reading public will undoubtedly seize upon 'The Raiders' and devour it eagerly. Nothing so tempting has been provided for some time."

Dundee Advertiser.

"Mr. Crockett can write admirably; and indeed his book as a whole is excellently well written."—British Weekly.

"The Earl of Little Egypt is a singular figure, well conceived and powerfully drawn. But the charm of the book is in the sense with which its every part is suffused, of the free life of the open country, of sea and moor and mountains, and of the strong human characters which that life produces—a sense which makes the town-bound citizen long to find himself amid these scenes, and to fill his lungs with the breezes which blow there."—Christian World.

The book is eminently readable."—Daily Telegraph.By E. Lynn Linton.—THE ONE TOO MANY. 3 vols."The whole book teems with brilliant epigrams and marvellous apophthegms... In many respects as a matter of fact, 'The One Too Many' is fully entitled to rank among the most powerful and remarkable novels of the day."—Daily Telegraph.Mrs. Linton's best characters have a singular vitality of their own, and in 'The One Too Many' Miss Chervin stands out as a heroine who is real flesh and blood... The novel is a living and exceedingly powerful and moving piece of work, and it is written with that telling force of style of which the authoress has the secret."—Women.By D. Christie Murray.—IN DIREST PERIL. 3 vols."In Direst Peril displays the attractions of a plausible plot, stirring action, and strong human interest. A powerful and brightly-written story, rife with thrilling incident and cleverly worked up to a dramatic denouement which has the indisputable merit of thorough originality. From its first page to its last 'In Direst Peril' is an eminently entertaining and fascinating book."—Daily Telegraph.By Mrs. Campbell Praed.—CHRISTINA CHARD. 3 vols.

RED DIAMONDS. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

"In point of plot and closeness of construction by far the most remarkable of Mr. McCarthy's works of fiction. What surprises is a bold and original conception, and the carrying out of the same with a highly dramatic finish after a fashion which no deliberately sensational novelist has surpassed."—World.

A PROTEGEE OF JACK HAMLIN'S, &c. With 20 illustrations. By HENRY MARTE.

"Mr. Mart's latest collection of stories is replete of the absurd humor and unbridled talking the artistic allowance and judicious contrast which impart such a fascinating interest to the very earliest works of this illustrious vociferator."—Daily Telegraph.

A DOG AND HIS SHADOW. By R. E. FRANCHILLON.

A FAIR COLONIST. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood. By KENNETH GLANVILLE.

"A fair colonist is really a very good story of the adventurous kind, well written, full of incident and variety. Moreover the South African novelist seems somehow to succeed in giving us a local color which is pleasantly removed from the 'word-painting' of the ordinary novelist."—Woman, for Illustration.

POPULAR NOVELS, WHICH HAVE ALSO LITERARY CHARACTER.

A Third Edition of DIANA TEMPEST
IS IN PREPARATION.

By MARY CHOLMONDELEY,
Author of 'Sir Charles Danvers' and 'The Danvers Jewels.'
3 vols.

The BARON DE HOOKWORMS in PUNCH says: "Those who love a really good novel, excellent both in story and in literary style, will be thankful to acquire, by purchase or loan, the goods—the extra good goods—which the Gods provide. There is neither page nor paragraph in these three volumes that can be skipped without loss to the skipper. Each character is carefully analyzed, in so incisive and epigrammatic a style, and with evidently so rare a knowledge of moral anatomy, as will occasionally remind the reader of Thackeray. The Baron wishes his friends no worse luck than a rainy afternoon for the perusal of 'Diana Tempest'."

And the TIMES says:—"Of Miss Cholmondeley's clever novels, 'Diana Tempest' is quite the cleverest."

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE calls the book "a study in men and minds which will stand in the front rank of fiction for some time to come."

The STANDARD speaks of "the charm of the heroine." The TELEGRAPH says: "Its plot is strong, bold, and original." The ATHENÆUM advises every one who can enjoy a novel, full of humour and real pathos, to read 'Diana Tempest'; and the SATURDAY REVIEW says it "is a remarkably clever and amusing novel."

Second Edition of The GREATER GLORY.

By MAARTEN MAARTENS,
Author of 'The Sin of Joost Avelingh,' 'An Old Maid's Love,' and 'God's Fool.'
3 vols.

From the GUARDIAN.

"'The Greater Glory' is a strangely beautiful book. Mr. Maartens has the rare power of keeping his hand steady while working the kind of material that forces most writers to transgress at every possible point the order and symmetry of art. He showed this power unmistakably in 'The Sin of Joost Avelingh,' and he manifests it again with increased intensity and refinement in the present work. We are not quite sure that he is not in danger of carrying refinement a little too far. When he is dealing with the good people of the story his reserve cannot be too highly praised; he never falls into sentimentalism or even into commonplace. But in the development of the bad characters his inexorability produces now and then an effect of unreality. The baron's character is a beautiful one; and gradually, as sorrow after sorrow demands new sacrifices of pride to integrity, it becomes that of a perfect saint. But in the beginning, though ruin stares him in the face, he will not sell Deynum to the new man. The pivot event of a masterly plot is the sudden sale of the property to a French marquis who is dying of cancer in the throat, and wants a house anywhere where he can rest till the end comes. Mr. Maartens is not only most interesting and most attractive, but he is most artistically perfect, when he is touching the deep and delicate springs of life and faith. The book has many beautiful scenes, but its greatest charm is not in any one scene; it is the gradual evolution of beauty out of beauty, till the climax is reached in the 'greater glory' of the old baron's destitute and Reinout's renunciation."

From the REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

"Maarten Maartens has already won a European as well as a Transatlantic reputation by his 'Sin of Joost Avelingh,' 'God's Fool,' and 'An Old Maid's Love'; but 'The Greater Glory' will enhance that reputation as no previous work has done, for it is in every way the finest, most dramatic, and, at the same time, the most highly spiritual creation he has given to the world. Maarten Maartens is pre-eminently an artist."

LITERATURE

The Life of Sir Harry Parkes, K.C.B., G.C.M.G., sometime Her Majesty's Minister to China and Japan. By S. Lane-Poolo and F. V. Dickins. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE East has not infrequently been the scene of the early beginnings of great careers. Clive and Warren Hastings landed in India at the youthful age of seventeen, and Parkes was four years short of seventeen when he began that work in China which he finished in the Legation at Peking. After the death of his parents, which occurred when he was quite a child, he was entrusted to the guardianship of an uncle at Birmingham, who sent him to the Grammar School of that town. The death of this relative in 1841, however, brought his school career to an end, and at the invitation of his cousin, Mrs. Gütlaff, he sailed in the same year for Macao, where Dr. Gütlaff played the double part of missionary and Government interpreter. Amid his new surroundings young Harry Parkes soon made friends, and, indeed, the social success of the lad was a source of anxiety to his self-constituted guardians. Bright and clever, he was a welcome guest wherever he went, and was a prime favourite with Sir Henry Pottinger, H.M.'s Minister, and the heads of departments. Sir Rutherford Alcock thus records his first impressions of the boy two or three years later:—

"A bright, intelligent-looking youth of sixteen, and in appearance still more youthful both in face and stature. The description 'small of stature for his age, with fair hair, a bright blue eye, and a fresh colour, with a quick and eager intelligence' exactly corresponds with the first impression I received: to which I may add, as it remained characteristic in him to the end of his life, that there was always something of a nervous eagerness, both in speech and manner, reminding one of the straining of a dog at his leash in sight of the quarry; and the peculiarly slow and deliberate circumlocutions and mode of conducting business with foreign officials in China must often have sorely tried his powers of control whilst acting as interpreter. This and his quickness of apprehension whatever work he might be called upon to undertake, and his capacity for labour in mastering it, were all eminently characteristic."

In 1842 Harry Parkes accompanied Sir H. Pottinger's expedition up the Yangtze-kiang, was present at the taking of Chin-kiang, and took part in the negotiations connected with the conclusion of the treaty of Nanking. Until this time foreigners had been allowed to trade at Canton only, and even there had been subjected to every possible indignity. Under the East India Company's management the "merchants had been placed by the Chinese in that place of inferiority which it has ever been the persistent aim of official arrogance to force upon the people whom they contemptuously term 'foreign devils' or 'outer barbarians.' The Company's agents were allowed to address the local Chinese authorities only at Canton, and were not suffered to plant their foot on any other spot of all the spacious soil of China; and even at Canton they were compelled to approach the mandarins only in the form of a humble 'petition,' communicated through the medium of the body of native traders known as the Hong merchants. They had no locus standi as Englishmen: they were merely admitted to trade on sufferance by the good offices of their Chinese customers of the Hong."

The transfer of the protection of British interests from the Company to the Crown in 1833 effected little or no change in international relations, and eventually the overbearing conduct of the mandarins led, in 1839, to a declaration of war. The treaty of Nanking would, it was hoped, have put matters on a satisfactory footing, and if its provisions, which Mr. Lane-Poolo summarizes as follows, had been faithfully carried out by the Chinese, such would doubtless have been the result. The treaty "provided for the security and protection of British subjects in China, who might 'carry on their mercantile pursuits without molestation or restraint at the cities and towns of Canton, Amoy, Foochowfoo, Ningpo, and Shanghai,' not with the Hong merchants of Canton merely, but with 'whatever persons they please.' British consular officers were to be appointed 'to reside at each of the above-named cities or towns to be the medium of communication between the Chinese authorities and the said merchants.' The island of Hongkong was ceded in perpetuity to the Crown of England, as a port where British ships might careen and stores be kept; and an indemnity of twenty-one million dollars was to be paid for the cost of the Expedition caused by 'the violent and unjust proceedings of the Chinese high authorities,' and the opium destroyed by Commissioner Lin. Pending the payment of the indemnity, by instalments spread over three years, the islands of Koolangoo and Chusan were to be held by Great Britain. Entire equality between the two Governments was assumed throughout the Treaty, and 'Her Britannic Majesty's Chief High Officer in China' was to 'correspond with the Chinese High Officers both at the capital and in the provinces,' not in the old humiliating form of a 'petition,' but by a 'communication."

So long as Chusan and Koolangoo were held by our troops the Chinese, after their usual manner, maintained a peaceful attitude, but these places were no sooner given up than outrages on foreigners became the order of the day. Parkes himself was the object of a cowardly attack at Amoy. The factories at Canton were burnt to the ground, and a party of missionaries was very nearly done to death in the neighbourhood of Shanghai. Happily, on the occurrence of this last outrage, Sir Rutherford Alcock was Consul at Shanghai, with

Parkes as his interpreter, and his management of this extremely difficult case is an instructive object lesson of the way in which the Chinese should be treated:—

"In this vital crisis Consul Alcock took his responsibility in his hands with a courage and firmness beyond praise. There were no specific instructions to go upon, and it would have been fatal to wait several weeks for orders from the Plenipotentiary at Hongkong. To delay would have been to play the Chinese game. The criminals would escape, and British prestige would sink to zero. Six Englishmen had recently been murdered near Canton: were the like atrocities to be permitted at Shanghai? Accordingly, when five days had passed, and nothing but ineffectual promises had been given by the Intendant, the Consul took a step memorable in the history of consular intrepidity. He informed the Taotai that he would stop all payment of duties by British ships until full satisfaction should be obtained; that meanwhile not a single grain junk should leave the river; and that if the chief criminals were not apprehended within forty-eight hours, he would take 'such other measures as the due enforcement of our Treaty rights might seem to demand.' To realize the full meaning of this spirited announcement it must be stated that there were no less than 1400 grain junks and 50 war junks in the river, backed by at least 13,000 discontented vagabonds in the neighbourhood; and that to overawe this host by sea and land, the Consul had to rely upon one single sloop-of-war. H.M.S. Childers, however, responded pluckily to the call, and her captain, Commander Pitman, instantly agreed to support the Consul's action."

The result of this spirited mode of procedure was that the mandarins, after some prevarication, complied fully with the Consul's demands.

Parkes early learned to gauge the true character of the mandarins, and to recognize that no faith was to be placed either in their promises or their professions. His whole career was one long struggle with that "hidebound body of pedantic literati, the grist of an irrational examination mill, who represent alike statesmanship and clerkship in China." After having served as interpreter at Amoy and Foochow, he proceeded to Siam to assist at the conclusion of a treaty which Sir John Bowring had orders to negotiate. With his usual ability and energy he diligently seconded his chief in this difficult undertaking, and at its conclusion was entrusted with the duty of presenting the treaty to the Queen. While on leave on this occasion he made the acquaintance of, and married, Miss Fanny Plumer, an alliance which was productive of great though short-lived happiness on both sides. On returning to China he was appointed acting consul at Canton, where Commissioner Yeh was indulging in a more than usually repulsive and obstructive attitude towards foreigners. With a haughty disregard of treaty obligations, he refused to allow foreigners to enter the gates of the city, and persistently declined to hold any personal communication with Parkes. Such an attitude could only lead to hostilities, and on Yeh's refusal of any adequate reparation for a gross insult offered to the British flag on board the lorch Arrow, war was declared. After some delay, caused by the diversion of the China force to India, an attack was made upon Canton. The city was easily taken, and when once within the walls Parkes started in pursuit of Yeh. Having procured guides who were in the secret of Yeh's place of concealment, Parkes, with Capt. Key and a small party of blue-jackets, followed on the trail of the fugitive :—

"At last the guides called a halt at the door of a third-rate yamun, which appeared closed and deserted. The doors were forced open, and the blue jackets were all over the place in a moment. It was evident that they were now on the right scent. The house was full of hastily packed baggage. Mandarins were running about—yes, running about; and at last one came forward and delivered himself up as Yeh. It was a fine act of devotion, but it did not impose upon Parkes, who had a portrait of the great unseen. The man was not fat enough, and was at once pushed aside, and hurrying on they at last spied a very fat man contemplating the achievement of getting over the wall at the extreme rear of the yamun. Capt. Key and Commodore Elliot's Coxswain rushed forward. Key took the fat gentleman round the waist (or neck), and the Coxswain twisted the august tail of the Imperial Commissioner round his fist. There was no mistake now;—this was the veritable Yeh. Instinctively the blue jackets felt that it must be Yeh, and they tossed up their hats and gave three rattling cheers."

The city, having been captured, had to be occupied and held, and an allied commission was appointed by Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, consisting of Parkes with an English and a French officer, to administer affairs. The whole burden of this task fell upon Parkes, and with marked ability he succeeded in governing a city containing a million inhabitants with a comparatively insignificant force of British and French soldiers. Meanwhile Lord Elgin went northwards with the intention of concluding a treaty at Peking. But with that fatal habit of temporizing which it has been our practice to adopt towards the Chinese, he consented at their request to forego entering the capital, and to negotiate at Tientsin. Like all concessions to the Chinese, this one brought its reward, and when Sir Frederick Bruce the following year advanced, on his way to Peking, to the mouth of the Peiho, the fleet was fired upon from the Taku forts with so deadly an effect that retreat was inevitable. "This very sad news from the Peiho," wrote Sir Horace Rumbold,

"will reach you at the same time as these few lines. There never was, I believe, a more complete piece of treachery than that practised by the Chinese Government since the very day of the signature of the Treaty. A document which you sent home (or rather a précis of which went home) last January goes far to prove this. It is a letter from a spy.....The document I take home with me in extenso by this mail."

Such a base act of treachery could only be avenged by war, and in 1860 an allied force of English and French, after having captured the forts at Taku, marched via Tientsin towards Peking. The story of the capture of Parkes and his companions at Tungechow is too well known to need repetition here. It will be remembered that Parkes and Loch were at first confined within the loathsome prison of the Board of Punishments. Subsequently they were removed to a temple, and there occurred a memorable struggle between the mandarins and Parkes, the first striving to enjoin him into compromising Lord Elgin's action, and Parkes steadily refusing to save his life by in any way hampering his chief.

At last, on the approach of the allied army to the walls of the city, the Chinese deemed it wise to let their prisoners go. In the words of Mr. Loch :—

"About noon a mandarin called, who had a long whispered conversation with Hang-ki. Hang-ki then returned to his seat, and after quietly drinking a cup of tea, said to Parkes that Prince Kung had decided upon releasing us at once, and that we should be sent about two o'clock that afternoon into the allied camp. Parkes merely bowed in answer, and when he told me, said, 'Don't exhibit any pleasure or feeling.' I suggested that as the discussion about the sun and earth must be by this time nearly exhausted, he should ask their opinion as to whether the moon rotates on her own axis, which I believed was a doubtful point in Europe. Without saying one word respecting our release, Parkes quietly began on this subject and continued until Hang-ki's patience was exhausted, when he exclaimed, 'You appear to be alike indifferent as to whether you are to die or live.' Parkes replied, 'Not at all; but we have now had considerable experience of the vacillation and the deceit of the Chinese Government, and therefore until our release becomes an accomplished fact, we venture to doubt it.'"

The release, however, did become an accomplished fact, but not a few of the other captives died of the tortures inflicted upon them. The Chinese were in no position to offer any further resistance to the demands made upon them, and having occupied a gate of Peking, Lord Elgin concluded a fresh convention with Prince Kung. After some delay Parkes returned to England on a two years' leave of absence, in the course of which he received the honour of a knight commandership of the Bath as a reward for his long and trying services.

Shortly after his return to China, Sir Harry Parkes was appointed Minister in Japan, and carried with him all the energy and insight into the Oriental character which had distinguished him in China. With a true instinct he recognized that the feudal system which had hitherto prevailed in the country was destined to disappear, and he cordially supported the progressive party who desired to see the Mikado a sovereign de facto as well as de jure. More than once Parkes was attacked by assassins who were partisans of the old order of things.

After eighteen years of active diplomacy at Tokio, Sir Harry Parkes was promoted to the Legation at Peking, and with this promotion begins the saddest part of his career. Throughout his previous service in China he had been invariably successful by meeting the mandarins with the only weapon they understand. Justice and right have little meaning for them, and might seems to be the only argument that is of the least avail. At Peking this argument was taken from him, and he had to attempt by words, and words alone, to overcome the hostility of the officials of the Tsung-li Yamun. As Mr. Poole says :—

"The anti-foreign feeling displayed in riots among the common people was fully shared by the Government at Peking, but took a different form. Instead of burning houses and frightening missionaries' wives, the Ministers amused themselves with tormenting the Foreign Representatives. Masters of the art of procrastination, they drove business-like Envoys to despair with their interminable delays and ceaseless flow of talk. To get a decision from the Tsung-li Yamun, said Parkes, was 'like trying to draw water from a well with a bottomless bucket.'.....They grew utterly reckless of the consequences of continued contumacy, and in their incurable shuffling seemed, as Parkes remarked, to take a positive 'pleasure in hanging their heads over a precipice.' But it was no pleasure to Sir Harry to have dealings with them in this mood. He was the special mark for their irritating assaults."

The constant worry and annoyance caused by this exasperating attitude of the Tsung-li Yamun told upon Parkes's health, which had already been weakened by the work, dangers, and trials through which he had gone. An attack of fever overcame his power of resistance, and on the 22nd of March, 1885, the end came.

"It was the work, not the fever, that killed him. He never allowed his brain a moment's rest, and his ceaseless mental activity rendered him abnormally sensitive to an illness which, though not light, would not, at the stage which it had reached, have given cause for alarm in ordinary circumstances."

Thus passed away the ablest champion of British interests in the far East.

We cannot close this article without sounding a note in praise of the admirable way in which the biography has been compiled. The editors, Mr. Lane-Poole and Mr. Dickins, have succeeded in thoroughly identifying themselves with the course of events which they chronicle, and while presenting a true and lively image of the man of whom they write, they have done discriminating justice to the signal ability and sterling qualities which enabled him to carve out for himself so distinguished and useful a career.

The Roxburghe Ballads. Final Part of Vol. VII. Edited, with Special Introduction and Notes, by J. Woodfall Ebsworth, M.A. (Ballad Society.)

THE publication by the Ballad Society of the valuable collection which illustrates the later Stuart period draws near its completion. It is a quarter of a century since the enterprise was begun under the care of that careful literary antiquary Mr. W. Chappell, and now at length Mr. Ebsworth, who has so excellently edited the four volumes which form the "second series," finds himself on the point of concluding his labours with a general index. It is disappointing to learn that he also finds himself hampered in his good work by the Society's lack of funds; but it is to be hoped that his demonstration of that body's usefulness and his exhortations will bring many more guineas to its coffers.

The contents of the concluding part of vol. vii. fall naturally into three main groups—nautical, historical, and religious. As usual, careful reproductions of woodcuts abound, the pedigrees of the MSS. and black-letter are given, and enough (not to say more than enough) is provided in the way of commentary. As is usual, too, in such collections, the mixture of company is of the oddest. Compositions devoid of all art jostle others which are very near approaches to poetry; true patriotism hob-nobs with vulgar "swagger"; grossness elbows deep religious feeling. For the subject-matter, we have the romantic tale of the girl who disguises herself in man's clothes and follows her lover, in the manner of a hundred stories of the age; the faithful youth and the inconstant fair, handled after the fashion of Caroline minor poetry; the merry narrative of amorous craft treated in the fashion which is of all ages; the young woman who wanders through ballad literature uttering what is always shown to be the perfectly groundless fear that she "was born to die a maid"; the doings of Jack ashore; fighting by land and sea in the nation's cause and in private enmity; the execution of a monarch and of interesting offenders of less note, with appropriate dying speeches; the gay adventurer's exhortation; the salutation of the birth of Christ in twenty different ways; the eternal feud between youth and age; and many a loyal song on the troubles and triumphs of the Charleses, with equally loyal songs on the accession of William of Orange. There is, perhaps, no single ballad of remarkable value in this book, but its very heterogeneity is in itself valuable and instructive, and there is scarcely a single item which is not interesting and which does not afford a picturesque glimpse into the manners and temper of the times and the byways of Stuart history. In this respect some of the sea-ballads, the pieces on General Monk, 'The Jolly Welsh Woman,' and 'The Farmer's Son of Devonshire,' strike us as particularly notable where all are worth the student's perusal. If space permitted it would be pleasant to dwell on two or three in some detail, in spite of the fact that most of them, when regarded from a merely critical point of view, are chiefly characterized by that exaltation of commonplace and that complete literary ineptitude which form the one common feature (if we dare whisper it) of three-fourths of the genuine ballad literature of the world. A short account of the adventures of an Elizabethan 'prentice, as here given, may be ventured in this connexion. The 'prentice went as a factor to Turkey, where he first somewhat distinguished himself when "one score of knights most hardy one day he made to bleed" to teach them a proper respect for his queen. Thereupon the "king" of the Turks called him "boy," and set his son at him. The 'prentice dealt the prince "a box upon the ear, which broke his neck asunder," and was cast to two famishing lions. He was weaponless, so "by manly valour their hearts he tore in sunder." This feat "afflicted" the king "with great terror," immediately turned all his hate into remorse and love, and made him deem the 'prentice an angel:—

"No, no, I am no Angel," the courteous young man said,

"But born in famous England where God's Word is obey'd;

Assisted by the heavens, who did me thus befriend,
Or else they had most cruelly brought here my life to end."

The king was still further affected by the courteous young man's speech, and straightway fell to praising England and its queen: So taking up this young man, he pardon'd him his life,

And gave his daughter to him to be his wedded wife,

Where then they did remain, and live in quiet peace,

In spending of their happy days in joy and love's increase.

Finis coronat opus.

It remains to say a word or two of the editing. Mr. Ebsworth is so full of his work that we cannot find it in our hearts to grumble because his work is a little too full of him. Yet we must admit that he thrusts upon us his own personality, his private opinions on irrelevant matters, his obiter dicta upon the way we live now, and his poetic efforts, rather more than others may like. Possibly some of the gentlemen who edit publications for text societies have been a little demoralized by the example of their chief begetter; but, after all, perhaps we ought not to exact from them that reserve which is incumbent on a writer who is not addressing himself to a circle of private friends and fellow sociétaires. If Mr. Ebsworth more easily endures the dry-as-dust labours of collating and pigeon-holing through the solace of such gentle dalliance, it is not for critics to object; it is not, however, quite apparent why he should put into print—in this volume—his views upon "the desertion of 'Chinese Gordon,'" his agreeable little verses, his estimate of Adelaide Procter, his favourite passages from the works of Mr. Kipling, and other such trifles. However, they are easily avoided, and their presence does not in the least detract from the value of Mr. Ebsworth's erudite and conscientious redaction, or in any way prevent his volumes being a most meritorious addition to our too scanty stock of well-edited ballad literature.

Appearance and Reality: a Metaphysical Essay. By F. H. Bradley. (Sonnen-schein & Co.)

THE obvious sincerity, seriousness, and independence with which this work is written are worthy of praise, and every one will regret the physical infirmities, so modestly alluded to in the preface, which have delayed its completion and doubtless greatly increased the difficulties of its composition. We must also admire—what, however, somewhat robs the book of vivacity—the almost complete abjuration of that personal contentious mode of discussion which rendered Mr. Bradley's 'Principles of Logic' one long and bitter polemic. We once, indeed, find opponents, after being grossly misrepresented, taunted with "defect of nature or education, or probably both." But we have detected only one solitary reference, and that in the preface, to "stupid tradition and ancestral prejudice," that imaginary foe—for it does not seem probable that there ever was a time when Englishmen accepted their philosophical creed blindly and without honest conviction—so often tilted at in the former volume. As to substance, a distinct novelty must be admitted in the work before us and a decided instructiveness, not, however, always in the direction designed by its author. Where precisely to classify him among the idealists—if he will have patience with us for attempting anything so presumptuous—is far from easy. He has certainly made good his claim to be more than a mere repeater of Hegel—such as, despite his rhetorical ability and his power of investing whatever he says with plausibility, the new Master of Balliol must be pronounced to be. Mr. Bradley, on the other hand, working for himself, aims at leading us, indeed, to an Absolute, but an Absolute nearer perhaps to Schelling's than to Hegel's, Substance rather than Spirit. He has qualms about "the dialectic method," by which we presume he means Hegel's; he has apprehended, more correctly than we thought one brought up on, and still largely accepting, Hegelian lines ever could apprehend, the true nature of thought and its relation to reality. In his interesting chapter (the fifteenth) on the connexion of these two he distinctly, and on sound grounds, refuses to identify them. It seems to us that he should have gone further than he does. If we understand him, he would make thought a sort of intermediate stage to reality, and believes that on this ground he can offer a good defence against his allies, who press upon him the difficulty "of thought's desiring a foreign perfection." He would answer, "Thought desires for its content the character which makes reality..... But thought can desire 'these features' because its content has them already in an incomplete form," a saying which seems to us hardly less mysterious than one of Hegel's. "The entire reality will be merely the object thought out, but thought out in such a way that mere thinking is absorbed." Once more we shall "possess the immediacy and strength of simple apprehension"; we shall, in fact, have that impossible thing, intellectual intuition. It is impossible to avoid thinking that in all this Mr. Bradley is on a wrong tack. He is voluntarily delivering himself into the hands of those opponents against whom he so vigorously contended that thought was essentially different from reality and inadequate to it. This last position seems to be the true one. It is, if we are not mistaken, the true inference to be drawn from all the mystifying dialectical puzzles of Mr. Bradley's Book I., on the contents of which it is now time for us to say a few words.

They are at first sight sufficiently surprising—to the ignorant by their novelty, to the well-informed by their antiquity, to all but an Hegelian idealist by their apparent unreasonableness, and even to him by their curious conclusion and their excess of scepticism. Here are reproduced all the arguments and paradoxes of Parmenides, of Zeno the Eleatic, and of Antisthenes, and all extended over a far wider domain, but directed to the same result, by an intellect and a temper singularly akin to that of those ancient mystics or sophists. It is sought to prove that all we seem most sure of is full of unthinkable contradiction. We cannot admit things and qualities, for, to use the old Megarian instance, which will serve as well as another, we contradict ourselves when we say, "Socrates is good," since Socrates is Socrates and good is good (see p. 20, "If you predicate what is different, you ascribe to the subject, what it is not; and if you predicate what is not different, you say nothing at all"). We cannot accept the distinction between primary and secondary qualities, for the so-called primary qualities are as much in relation to our sensitive organs as the secondary; and, this being so, how can we speak of any quality as "in" the object, or, for that matter, "in" us, or indeed anywhere? But even Relation—that mystical word which to so many of our idealists has seemed the substance of knowledge and the root of the universe—will not stand inquiry. You cannot have relation per se; "that relations can somehow make the terms upon which they seem to stand.....is quite unintelligible"; "nothings cannot be related." The difficulties as to space and time are well known. How can space and time be other than infinite? yet how can anything real, whether substance or quality, be infinite? and yet again, if we make space, say, a relation, then, since space is necessarily divisible and infinitely divisible into spaces, we never come to any terms between which it is a relation; and it is similarly impossible—though in physics we often suppose it done—to break up time into indivisible moments. (To which last one is tempted to reply that the physicist or the geometrician with his calculus of infinitesimals does not postulate indivisible, but undivided, moments or spaces.) Once more Motion is attacked, as might have been expected, with the old weapons. "The thing moved must be one"—which all will admit—"and again the time must be one," i.e., the time cannot be "many times, out of relation and not part of a single temporal whole"; and thus Motion involves the absurdity of a thing being "in two places in one time." We have here, we think, abstracted with fairness Mr. Bradley's argument, and indicated how he would meet the objection of common sense, that it is not in the same but in different times that the body is found in different places. All the same we hold ourselves with common sense, and find this proposed refutation of it entirely sophistical. To us the fact seems to be that continuity, whether in time or elsewhere, though real and universal, is perceivable, but essentially unthinkable. Nor is this a paradox except to those who use the word "thought" without reflecting on its meaning (among whom we fear Mr. Bradley must be included). For thinking is essentially division, isolation, concentration on a single point; we "mentally stop"—as Aristotle admirably put it—the flowing current of perception; and it is just this stoppage and concentration that makes thought a powerful instrument of investigation, but at the same time renders that character of reality which we express by the words "movement," "change," and "continuity" essentially impossible to be grasped by it. Conception can by its very nature give us only fixed, stationary points, and relations between such. But what we cannot conceive we can perceive; those who set up the former operation as the criterion and standard of the latter have no difficulty in making the latter appear ridiculous and contradictory, in making human intelligence appear impotent, and reality beyond our ken. But the error is theirs. The absolute division which Kant set up between forms of perception and categories, though involving much that we cannot accept, seems to imply a substantial truth, which those who have set themselves in England and Germany to develop his doctrine, and, as they say, "clear it of contradictions," have fatally ignored, to the confusion of themselves and the mystification of their readers. "Cause," we are told, is "an attempt to account rationally for change. A becomes B, and this alteration is felt to be not compatible with A." We answer that it is only so felt by the conceptual dogmatist. A to him must doubtless be A, and nothing but A; but this operation of conceiving A, this "fixation" of A (as the psychologists say), important and instructive and necessary as it is, in no way affects the real A. The real A is not fixed; so perception assures us, though through conception we can never grasp the fact, any more than by the most diligent use of our eyes we can apprehend acoustic facts, or by the most diligent use of our ears facts visual. It follows from this that we agree with Mr. Bradley in thinking that we cannot by "cause" rationally account for change. Such an account would bring perceptual fact under the law of conception, would explain difference by identity; and it is pleasant to see that Mr. Bradley has enough humour and enough philosophy to laugh at the ridiculous "identity of cause and effect," of which so much has been made of late years by thinkers of very opposite schools.

Nothing, we imagine, will cause more surprise among the school that has been accustomed to regard Mr. Bradley as one of its champions than his attack in chap. ix. on "the Self." To use his own vigorous, if somewhat unchastened language: "The Self, they will assure us, is not apparent, but quite real. And it is not only real in itself, but its reality, if I may say so, spreads beyond its own limits and rehabilitates itself. It provides a fixed nucleus round which the facts can group themselves securely." Mr. Bradley, on the other hand, shows his readers with ample and superfluous fulness that no such fixed nucleus is discoverable; and we need only compliment him on his psychological learning and on the acumen, the natural result of such learning, with which he distinguishes and precisely defines the several senses in which this "self" has been understood, and shows how unsatisfactorily the "self," however understood, fulfils the central rôle which has been attributed to it in much modern English metaphysics, whether relating to cognition or to action.

In this and the subsequent chapter our sceptical metaphysician reaches the outermost verge of his scepticism, for the attack in chap. xii. on "things in themselves" might almost be described as a beating of the air, so cold and unsubstantial is the defence that these mysterious entities are now likely to find from any school. We may quote the witty observation describing "Mr. Spencer's attitude towards his Unknowable" as "a proposal to take something for God simply and solely because we do not know what the devil it can be"; and then it becomes high time to say something of Mr. Bradley's own positive and reconstructive chapters, the major part of his book. These, as we have already intimated, lead the reader up to a unity like that of Parmenides, or an absolute substance like that of Schelling, the one real, the sole individual, taking up into itself as attributes—to speak loosely—all those "appearances" criticized in the first book (for "what appears, for that sole reason, most indubitably is, and there is no possibility of conjuring its being away from it"), but harmonizing and subordinating them, so that they lose that self-contradictoriness which seemed necessarily to attach to them when taken as absolute, and which showed them, while holding indeed of reality, to be mere "appearances" of the real. We may then—nay, we must—disbelieve in absolutely existent things, or qualities, or relations, or time and space; we must disbelieve even in absolutely existent conscious individuals, in absolute knowledge or error, in absolute good or evil; but we must believe in the One Real, which somehow has within it as its "appearances"—to itself, it would seem—diverse, seemingly mutually exclusive individuals, sentient or otherwise, diverse qualities, good simultaneously with evil, and even all degrees of both simultaneously. It is a hard saying—harder, perhaps, than the formula of any religious credo. That may strain our faith to breaking tension; Mr. Bradley seems to demand not merely an enormous faith, but an equally prodigious scepticism. And yet, after all, the suspicion haunts us, as we have hinted above, that he rests on the same unsound basis as the ancient metaphysical idealism; thought can only embrace permanent objects ("the sensible is transient, but knowledge is not of the transient," to use the formula in which Aristotle states the basis of Platonism), therefore reality must be absolutely permanent, and, to avoid inconsistency, absolutely one. And to this we answer as before that thought cannot grasp the world, and that to see the world, in the favourite metaphysical phrase, sub specie aternitatis is to see it not as it is, but as it is not. Or again, that, if the world is individual, it is not so in a way that excludes the existence of individuals within it, just as the human body is individual, and yet each great organ—and possibly we should say every one of its millions of cells—is individual likewise.

We have thus, as we conceive, put in very narrow compass indeed not only the substance of many hundred pages of Mr. Bradley's subtle and labyrinthine argument, but also what seems to be its answer. In fact, detailed analysis or even adequately illustrative quotations would extend this review to an utterly unwieldy length.

We cannot but ask finally what such a philosophy as Mr. Bradley's does for us. The physical sciences, the field of determinate if partial knowledge, it avoids. Does it then satisfy our ideal aspirations? does it, we do not say soothe with the music of poetry, but chain and control with rigid metaphysical bars, that spirit of unrest, of despair, which stirs within us in our more imaginative moods when we ask for a key to the universe, for the purpose of life and all else, for our place in the whole? Religious philosophies and moralities of the higher kind have offered some answer to those questions; poetry has stilled and subdued them. But the barren dialectic of the work before us—bad often, so it seems to us, even as dialectic—what has it done or can it do? Good, it pretends to show, is not real, nor evil; soul, or personality, or self-consciousness is mere appearance, and body likewise; truth is delusion as well as error; space is not, and time is not, nor action, nor passion, nor relation of any kind. But the reader is told, there is an absolute, a whole. But this absolute "appears in its phenomena and is real nowhere outside them." It is not any one of them, "because it is all of them in unity." It is both good and bad; nay, even stronger language has to be used—"it manifests itself throughout in various degrees of goodness and badness." What is this but Spinozism, as useless for edification as for knowledge?

History of England under Henry the Fourth.
By James Hamilton Wylie, M.A.—Vol. II.
1405-6. (Longmans & Co.)

It is ten years since the appearance of Mr. Wylie's first volume, to which we gave a cordial welcome at the time; and we welcome the second none the less cordially, because the long interval has been turned to the best advantage. Mr. Wylie, indeed, failed to estimate at first the full magnitude of the task he had undertaken, and rather unfortunately promised on his title-page to complete his history in a second volume. Now he finds that it will require a third; and so abundant have his materials proved that whereas the first volume contained the history of more than five years, the second is devoted to the doings of two years only. At this rate we might reasonably doubt whether even three volumes will be found sufficient, for there are more than six years of the reign yet to come. But the third volume, it may be presumed, is far advanced, as Mr. Wylie hopes to publish it next year, and he seems to have no doubt that it will be the concluding one.

It is not surprising that the work should thus have grown under the author's hands. No one knows without long and patient investigation the extent of the materials that may be utilized for the history of any period; and Mr. Wylie is so thorough a worker that he has spared no pains to find out everything. The amount of new information that he has met with may be judged by the two different lists of authorities prefixed to this and the preceding volume. The titles of those consulted for the first volume fill only eight pages at the beginning; but the supplementary list of those referred to in vols. II. and III. extends to no fewer than forty-eight! A still better evidence will be found in the bulky foot-notes at the bottom of nearly every page of the present volume, which disclose an amount of reading and research hardly equalled in works of the like character. This is the part in which the antiquary will revel, and by which Mr. Wylie's historical accuracy will be tested in time to come. But leaving judgment on that point to the specialist, we can only say that never was a text better fortified with references to original sources.

We must not allow it to be inferred, however, that Mr. Wylie is a Dryadust. Very far from it. His love of accuracy is combined with a no less ardent love of literature, which appears in almost every page. This, as was observed in our previous notice, is frequently shown by quotations used as headlines for pages; but many are the quotations in the text as well. Chaucer and Gower, and Wycliffe and Hoccleve, are laid under contribution, very naturally, as contemporary classics; and the language even of the Rolls of Parliament or other original authorities is freely adopted in the text and justified by the foot-notes. In fact, Mr.

Wylie's liking for antique phraseology carries him just a little too far; for although it is a good thing for an historian, if he can do it easily, to familiarize his reader with the language of his authorities, the public really do expect a work published at the end of the nineteenth century to be written in modern English. To say that an archbishop could not safely come to the king unless "munited with men" is scarcely justifiable nowadays, merely because the expression was used by John Stow. Nor is it even true that Henry III. of Castile is "known in the old lists as Henry the Nesh." The adjective "neish," no doubt, may be found in Gower, and might perhaps have been used as a translation of Henry's French sobriquet "le Maladif"; but there is no evidence that it actually was so employed. And is a reference to Notes and Queries a sufficient warrant for the modern historian's diction when he talks of the king "gossiping his little nephew at the font stone"? There is more excuse for antique phraseology where the things themselves are antiquated; but even here the modern reader deserves some consideration. The antiquary, of course, knows what is meant when he reads that the Genoese "wasted their quarrels on the walls of Norwich"; neither is he troubled by "arblasts" and "arblastars." He may possibly even know what "polders" were without referring to the Latin definition from Meyer given in a foot-note. But Mr. Wylie is not supposed to be writing for antiquaries. If terms like these were scattered here and there at rare intervals only, the general reader might be trusted to get over the difficulty by the help of the context; and this would be the case if they were only used when there was some manifest occasion for them. But Mr. Wylie's words are often selected simply because they are quaint, antique, or provincial, and perhaps more expressive than classical English to those who know the dialect. It is picturesque, no doubt, to read (p. 207) that "the staith on the Ouse was alive with schuts, cog-boats, crayers," and so forth; but the only change the reader gets for the word "schuts" is in a foot-note as follows: "Or shouts, Sharpe, I. 440, 480, 611; II. 133, 167." It is also interesting to know that an alderman grocer supplied stores of all sorts "from pennyworths of subleware to gymews of avoirdupois," and to find by the foot-notes that both "sotilware" and "graunt bale on gymew" are met with in the Grocers' archives. Still, there might be a little less parade of words the meaning of which is not explained. The reader meets with "osmund" as an article of commerce on p. 72, and it is only on the recurrence of the term at p. 74 that it is explained in a parenthesis "or Swedish iron." And surely it was unnecessary to borrow a Scotch expression from the Aberdeen records to describe an ecclesiastical punishment imposed at Paris! The culprits, we are told, had to walk "sark-alane" through the streets. The cockney, no doubt, may turn for relief to the foot-note (though, by-the-by, it is not easy to discover one particular foot-note amid the solid mass at the bottom of a page), where he will find an equivalent in the words of Gower: "All naked but here shertès on." But why should a writer deliberately make his text less intelligible than his foot-notes?

Yet perhaps we have dwelt too much on this objection. When a common labourer has done some hard work for us, we let him whistle on his way home; and Mr. Wylie has done such excellent and toilsome work of a far superior character that it is a pity not to let him have his way in fancies of his own. How greatly this history of Henry IV.'s reign exceeds in fulness all its predecessors may be judged by a comparison with the corresponding portion of Sir James Ramsay's 'Lancaster and York,' published only two years ago. The whole reign, which Mr. Wylie means to complete in three volumes, occupies but 160 pages in Ramsay; while the period contained in the present volume covers in Ramsay only twenty-five. And when we consider the amount of obscurity which even yet overhangs several important subjects, it is not surprising that Mr. Wylie has discovered some material errors in his immediate forerunner.

"The year 1405," says Sir James Ramsay himself, "was, perhaps, the critical year of Henry's fortunes, and the turning-point of his life." This is apparently Mr. Wylie's view as well, as nearly three-quarters of the present volume are devoted to that year alone. It was not the year of the battle of Shrewsbury—that had been already fought and won in 1403, as was related by Mr. Wylie in his first volume—but it was the year of the conspiracy in favour of the two young Mortimers, of the revolt of Earl Mowbray and Lord Bardolph along with the old intriguer Northumberland, of the execution of the popular "martyr" Archbishop Scrope. And though Henry proved victorious in these as in former struggles, the conspirators still held together so far that, according to Mr. Wylie, it was in the spring of 1406 that the famous tripartite convention for the partition of England was drawn up, which previous historians, misled by Hall and Shakespeare, have placed before the battle of Shrewsbury. This precious compact, it seems, was arranged at Aberdaron, at the south-west extremity of Carnarvonshire—"the very ultima Thule of Welsh land"—between the Earl of Northumberland, Owen Glendower, and Sir Edmund Mortimer. Owen's share was to be the whole of Wales, and a pretty good slice of England besides, west of the Severn and the Mersey. Northumberland was to have all that lay north of a line between Worcester and the southern boundary of Norfolk; and Mortimer was to have all that remained of England—"if he could get it," as Mr. Wylie sarcastically remarks. He was certainly at a disadvantage compared either with his dreamy father-in-law Glendower, who had actual hold of Wales, or his scheming ally Northumberland, who had, at least till just before then, and might possibly have again, actual hold of a great part of the North.

It is curious that this audacious treaty has been regarded by some historians as a positive fable. One writer discredits it because the date is subsequent to the battle of Shrewsbury; another supposes it was "imagined by popular alarm." Yet there is no ground to doubt its genuineness, and we may observe that the date 1405 assigned to it by an early chronicler would cover the early part of what we should now call the year 1406—the very date, apparently, to which Mr. Wylie would refer it. On the 31st of March Owen actually wrote to Charles VI. of France, asking him to complete what he had done in behalf of Welsh national independence by forwarding certain proposals to the Pope for making the Church of Wales independent also, and putting not only the other dioceses of Wales itself, but also those of Bath, Exeter, Hereford, Worcester, and Leicester (i.e., Coventry and Lichfield), in subjection to the see of St. David's as metropolitan! Glendower, indeed, was a crazy visionary, as Shakespeare has depicted him, inspired by dreams and prophecies. But in days like those of Henry IV. a scheme for the partition of England was by no means absurd on the face of it.

The difficulties of Henry's rule are apparent at every turn. Those who befriend him at first desert him afterwards. Bishop Trevor, of St. Asaph, who had been his strong supporter, finding his own diocese and cathedral town ravaged by the Welsh, at last joins Owen Glendower. The Earl Marshal, son of Henry's old rival Mowbray, is married to Henry's niece and called to Council, but a question of precedence is ruled against him and he rebels. The Percies, of course, are a still more prominent example. But the very factiousness which weakens Henry weakens his adversaries as well, and family feuds like those of the Percies and the Nevills are his salvation. The Earl of Westmoreland is as treacherous towards the allies of Northumberland as Northumberland himself was towards Richard II. and Henry IV. successively. He lures Mowbray and Archbishop Scrop to a conference, declaring their demands to be most just and reasonable, gets them to drink with him in the open, and then catches them in a snare. The archbishop pays the penalty of his over-confidence with his head; and surely it is significant of the extremity of the crisis that Henry ventured to violate the immunities of the Church by procuring an archbishop's execution.

The view that Mr. Wylie takes of the king's conduct in this matter, we confess, is rather startling. He actually considers Henry "infirm of purpose," and that he was "ruled by impulse." It is only with diffidence that we can possibly question the opinion of one who has certainly the best right to judge. But the judgment is as novel as it seems to us ill borne out by any facts given by himself. It was a dreadful blunder, in Mr. Wylie's opinion, to bring an archbishop to the block, and a worse one still to lay his remains in his own cathedral to excite rage and pity. That is a matter, no doubt, fairly arguable; but where is the infirmity of purpose? The king's purpose seems, on the contrary, to have been wonderfully persistent. From Mr. Wylie's own pages we learn that he disarmed Archbishop Arundel's remonstrances beforehand with false assurances, pressed Chief Justice Gascoigne to pass sentence, and, when Gascoigne refused on the ground that it would be illegal, found a less scrupulous judge to do so in his place. If the exhibition of the mutilated body in the archbishop's own cathedral excited rage and pity, it was also a very public manifestation of the length to which Henry was capable of going. Old-fashioned scruples must not stand in his way if the spirit of rebellion was to be subdued. And what are we to infer from the results? The results were the surrender, one by one, of all the northern castles when the king went northwards afterwards, and that the Earl of Northumberland was obliged presently to leave the country. No doubt, however, the whole campaign put a most severe strain upon Henry himself, and if the illness that overtook him shortly after was not leprosy, as people said, it may fairly be attributed to harassing anxieties and an overtaxed frame.

Henry's supposed leprosy and the nature of the disease itself form one of a number of special subjects in this volume which are treated with great ability. On the other hand, it is no fault of Mr. Wylie that the two chapters on Irish history seem to have little connexion with events elsewhere. The volume ends with an account of the educational resources of the period which will rather astonish most people. England, it seems, was getting positively overbuilt with schools at the beginning of the fourteenth century.

We are glad to see that the present volume has a running date at the head of the page, which is a great assistance. But a fuller table of contents would also have been advantageous to the reader.

The Book of Common Prayer, from the Original Manuscript attached to the Act of Uniformity of 1662, and now preserved in the House of Lords. With Three Appendices by the Rev. James Cornford. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

This is not a new volume, but only a reissue of a work published in 1892, with the addition of some useful matter in the shape of appendices extending to eighty pages. As we have already noticed it, we need now refer to the three appendices only. The first consists of the "erasures, interlineations, &c., in the MS. which do not appear in the Printed Copy of the Annexed Book"; which shows the final state only of the MS. These are about two hundred in number, there being apparently two or three which have escaped the notice of the compiler. That there should have been so many mistakes in the original MS. is not to be wondered at, when the haste with which it was drawn up is considered. They mainly consist of two classes: first, those that are due to the carelessness of the scribe, and these are much the more numerous; and, secondly, those which were altered by authority at the last moment. The former are of little importance. A typical instance of the latter appears in the two erasures (on p. 56 of Morning Service, and p. 67 of Evening Service) of the words "and so continuing to the end of the service" after the direction to the priest to stand at the versicles following the Lord's Prayer which comes after the Creed. The omission of these words brings back the Annexed Book into agreement with the Convocation Book, and must have been made almost at the last moment. It has been argued that their omission proves distinctly that the compilers of the Prayer Book meant to direct the priest to continue kneeling. It is much more likely that they were omitted on the ground that they were superfluous, as no subsequent change of posture is ordered to the end of the service. The present practice of the clergy varies in this respect. It is a matter of extremely small importance, but it would be impossible to decide which are right and which are wrong.

The second appendix details the differences between the Annexed Book and the Convocation copy. These also are for the most part extremely unimportant. But there are a few additions in the Convocation Book, explaining the change of certain parts, which have not been transferred to the Annexed Book. As they have never appeared in print excepting in Mr. Parker's valuable and now scarce 'Introduction to the Revisions of the Book of Common Prayer,' we think it worth while to produce one of them here. It is in Sancroft's hand, at the foot of the first page of the Calendar, containing the month of January. It runs as follows:—

"The first Lessons are y^e same as before: Only y^e 6th of Exodus, w^{ch} was read Oct. 1 amongst y^e Apocrypha bookes, is now restor'd to its proper place in January; & so y^e following Lessons remove before it till y^e first of October be again otherwise supplied. The same is to be said of some Apocryphal additions to Daniel, w^{ch} were read wth y^e Canonically Chapters of y^e prophesy; but are now remov'd to y^e End of y^e Apocryphal Lessons. There are also 1st and 2nd Lessons appointed for 29th Febr. y^e y^e same Service may not be read two daies together in y^e Leap year."

We have printed this from the original, from which it will appear how difficult it is to produce an exact copy of handwriting of an earlier century, there being two or three variations in Mr. Parker's copy as well as in Mr. Cornford's.

There are, of course, in the Convocation Book, several other directions of a similar kind, which were duly attended to in the Annexed Book, but were not meant to form part of the book itself. These are all noticed in Appendix B, and have been printed with tolerable, though not absolutely exact, accuracy.

The particular direction we have reprinted is interesting, as it calls attention to a point which will probably be unknown to most of our readers, viz., that at the beginning of the reign of James I. there were sundry alterations in the lectionary. Few will have remarked these, except those who possess copies of editions of the Prayer Book issued between 1604 and 1662. Mr. Parker has noticed these variations, but in the note appended to each month has said that the editions of 1604, &c., begin with such and such chapters. Nevertheless several editions subsequent to 1604 do not answer to this description. Thus, in the note to October he says, "The editions of 1604, &c., begin with Exodus vi. and Joshua xx.," whereas in two editions of the reign (much later than 1604) of James I. we have the lessons given as "Tobi. 5" and "Jesu. 20." What other variations there may be we cannot pretend to have investigated. And what is most remarkable, there is no provision for a first lesson at morning service on October 1st in the Convocation Book, the space being filled by a ¶, the note at the bottom of the page, that only part of the sixth of Exodus is to be read, being erased.

It is not a little curious that there should be more than three hundred variations in the readings of the Psalms between the Annexed Book and the Convocation Book. Neither of them agrees precisely and in all points with any of the editions of Cranmer's Bible from which they are professedly taken. The Annexed Book deviates from them all much more than the other. It could not have been copied from the printed Convocation Book, and it seems probable that general instructions were issued to alter certain forms, such as are and be, who and which, which were somewhat carelessly observed.

Appendix C consists of the "Differences between the MS. and the Authorized Version of the Bible, 1611, in Quotations of Scripture directed to be inserted from the New Translation." Some of these seem to be mere errors of the scribe, e.g., in the gospel for the Epiphany "for thus it written" instead of for thus it is written. Others consist of insertions at the beginning of the gospels of such words as "Jesus said," &c. Others, again, were evidently altered designedly to accommodate the expressions to more modern ways of speech, as, for instance, the frequent change of ye into you, and of which into who. There are, moreover, slight changes of which it is difficult to say under which head they come, whether of accident or design, such, for instance, as the variation of "in heaven and earth" in the Annexed Copy from "in heaven and in earth" of the Authorized Version. In most of these cases it has been the custom of modern Prayer Books to follow the Authorized Version, although there can be no doubt that the alterations of the Annexed Book should have been preferred, because many of them were certainly designed, and of nearly all it might be said that they were probably intended.

What has been said will have shown that the execution of these appendices is not absolutely perfect. Nevertheless, we should not be doing justice to Mr. Cornford if we did not add that he has done his work, upon the whole, with great care. Perfect accuracy in such an undertaking can hardly be expected, and the faults are few and far between.

NEW NOVELS.

Christina Chard. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE "first idea" of Mrs. Campbell Praed's new novel (so we learn from the dedication) came from Mr. George Boughton, and all readers of 'Christina Chard' will be grateful to him for a suggestion which has borne such brilliant fruit. For in spite of an occasional touch of artificiality Mrs. Campbell Praed has worked out this strange story of a woman's vengeance with considerable resource and vivacity, and, what is more, has handled a difficult and delicate theme with a restraint and sympathy not always observable in some of her earlier efforts. Christina herself is a fascinating study; but there are half a dozen other characters of almost equal interest, idealized portraits in every case of types to be met with amongst the best and brightest circles of fashionable Bohemia. And underneath all this sparkle and frivolity, fine dresses and smart talk, the reader is made to feel the existence of the elemental passions of love and hate, jealousy and cupidity. The story of the Mount Murra Bubble is worked into the main plot with remarkable skill. As it has more than once fallen to the lot of the present reviewer to speak harshly of Mrs. Campbell Praed's work in the past, he may be allowed to congratulate her on the signal and legitimate success with which she has availed herself of the melodramatic possibilities of Anglo-Australian society.

Earls Court. By Alexander Allardyce. 3 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)

IN spite of its name Mr. Allardyce's new novel is not a study of metropolitan or suburban manners. The Earls Court to which he introduces us is the country seat of an hereditary legislator such as Mr. Labouchere himself might have depicted, while the atmosphere of the story is strictly in keeping with its alternative title of "a novel of provincial life." The mechanism of the plot is carefully arranged so as to provide full scope for the conflict of personal interests and to excite anticipations of a tragic catastrophe which are not disappointed, though the handling of the dénouement is singularly lacking in dramatic force or impressiveness. Mr. Allardyce has a vigorous and excellent narrative style, and his descriptions enable the reader to form a vivid picture of the material surroundings of his dramatis personæ and the conditions of their lives. With the characters themselves it is, unluckily, different. Good, bad, or indifferent, there is not one among them all that enlists sympathy or provokes interest. 'Earls Court' is a signal instance of the amount of ability that may be expended on the production of a dull novel.

The Price of a Pearl. By Eleanor Holmes. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

IN spite of the ability and earnestness displayed by Miss Holmes, the artificial construction of her plot and the inordinate length to which it is spun out will probably militate against its popularity. Life has been compared by a well-known writer to a handicap. Such a book as 'The Price of a Pearl' rather suggests the analogy of an obstacle race, in which the obstacles are not those of the cross-country order, but carefully and gratuitously devised for the discomfiture of the competitors. For the rest, Miss Holmes's portraiture is careful and refined; indeed, her male characters almost without exception display a sensitiveness that is quite feminine in its intensity; and the whole book furnishes ample evidence of attentive observation. The heroine excites a fitful interest, and some of the minor characters have a touch of lifelikeness. None the less a careful perusal of the entire story is more calculated to engender respect than gratitude.

The Surrender of Margaret Bellarmine. By Adeline Sergeant. 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

THOUGH shorter and less full of incident than the generality of novels which have of late years issued from Miss Sergeant's indefatigable pen, 'The Surrender of Margaret Bellarmine' is welcome, as indicating a return to that earlier and sanner manner of which 'No Saint' is an admirable example. As we read her latest book we feel more than ever convinced that it has only been by doing violence to the true bent of her talents that Miss Sergeant has indulged in melodrama. The novel of character, and not of incident, is her real forte; for although the adverse influences of her long allegiance to sensationalism may be traced in the present venture, it is, in regard to consistency and sincerity, greatly in advance of any of her recent books. Margaret Bellarmine's character is not only well conceived, but develops along lines that are at once natural and interesting. The gradual achievement of her "surrender" is treated with skill and genuine feeling, while her various spiritual vicissitudes are narrated in a manner which is all the more impressive from the self-effacement of the writer. The work, in short, is pitched in too uniformly minor a key throughout, and would have gained by the introduction of some humorous relief. But with this deduction it is well written and well worth reading.

A Fair Colonist. By Ernest Glanville. (Chatto & Windus.)

SOUTH AFRICA is so much in evidence just now as a land of infinite possibilities for the expansion of our race, that any well-written volume of fact or fiction connected with it is sure to be read. Mr. Glanville's book, which deals chiefly with Cape Colony, is apparently well founded on local knowledge; his descriptive passages deal with the veld and the woods, the rocks and kloofs; and his romance is sufficiently equipped with tragic and passionate incidents to catch the reader's attention. Nor is he without some ability in the presentment of character of the simpler sort. Makanna the Gaika, a sort of Umalopogaas tamed and harnessed to the white man's money-mill, has characteristics of his own, though they are rather generic than individual; while Gardner, the hunter and farmer, who rules his negroes with a rod of iron, yet has a touch of tenderness for individuals of his own colour, is typical of the qualities which have made our race the most successful colonists, and probably the best-hated nationality, on the face of the globe. Amos Fickin, the poacher, who finds life too circumscribed in England, has been evidently cast for the leading character. His liking for nature and one of her works, in the shape of Ada Tamplin, the lady colonist, is eloquently set forth; in other respects the portrait is unreal. Such a man would not in England be philosophical, or at any rate articulate, not to say loquacious in soliloquy; yet Amos, whom we find in the early chapters talking a sort of stage patois to Miss Tamplin, almost immediately afterwards expresses himself "like a book":—

"In this clay-covered island, Sally, where the sun has always got the influenza, the only crop one can depend upon is bricks, and no one can eat bricks with comfort. It's not only the clay one has to fight against, and the slugs and snails, green fly, red spider, caterpillars and weeds, but we've got the weather against us and foreign sunshine. Rheumatism gets fast hold of the spade farmer, the weight of clay breaks him in half, and the foreigner's sunshine just finishes him off. We've got to go south. Sally, before we can make a living out of a few spadefuls of soil, and if we don't, why the camel will be soon able to crawl through the eye of a needle; for after spending ten millions in parcelling the country into lots, he will have to spend other twenty millions in rescuing the poor agriculturists from the mud, and so he will get rid of his wealth."

In Africa this economist turns metaphysician and what not, but what son of the soil ever reasoned in such fashion? On the whole, we are led to believe that our author knows less of England than of the colonies, or probably America. The strange proceedings of Dorant, who works a brace of retrievers exactly like setters, "where the partridge calls," are a sufficient indication of this. We believe, on the other hand, that there will be a general acknowledgment of the accuracy of the writer's colonial pictures.

The Heir of Inglesby. By Violetta. (Sonnenschein & Co.)

'THE HEIR OF INGLESBY' is delightfully ingenuous. When the heroine discovers in her lover a long-lost cousin, "Do you mean to say," she asks, "that you are Sir Rudolpho?" "Yes, dearest," is his reply, "and you will soon be Lady Gwendoline." Whereupon a canon opportunely intervenes to bring down the curtain with his blessing. Sir Rudolpho, it may be added, is the son of the marriage of a baronet's only daughter to an Italian gentleman, so that his succession to the title is, to say the least, unusual. But in a novel of so profoundly romantic a character it is, perhaps, hypercritical to expect a close adhesion to the usages of society. Adequate concession to reality is made by the episode of the Signore di Como's death by the overturning of an electric tram-car.

The Little Squire: a Story of Three. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. (Cassell & Co.)

MRS. DE LA PASTURE'S story may be fairly described as a belated contribution to the literature which owed its rise to 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.' Adrien de Coursay, aged twelve, with his blue velvet jacket and knee breeches, lace-ruffled shirt, silk stockings, and low buckled shoes, is as well dressed as his prototype, though not so amusing; and if he does not succeed to a peerage, he at least acts as the good genius of the plot, and is as elegant in his sentiments as in his costume. We leave him, in his "rich velvet dress," teaching a little girl to pray, and with every prospect of developing into a first-class prig.

Le 15. Par Gyp. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

GYP's new collection of little scenes, which pass among her well-known characters, is not one of her best as a whole, but contains some specimens of conversation after her most approved style. Folleuil, for example, attacking clubs, asks why he should offer himself "to a thousand or fifteen hundred gentlemen, who have, in my opinion, no status which entitles them to sit in judgment on me. It would bore me, if they accepted me, to be enlisted into their ranks. When I hear fools, of whom I know plenty, say with a grand air: 'We have settled at the club that.....' (on which there follows some stupidity or other), I am pleased to think that I am able to settle for myself the poor little matters that I do settle." It is in this kind of natural talk of men and women of the world that Gyp is at her strongest.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

Discovery of Lakes Rudolf and Stefanie: a Narrative of Count Samuel Teleki's Exploring and Hunting Expedition in Eastern Equatorial Africa. By Lieut. L. von Höhnell. Translated by Nancy Bell. 2 vols. Maps and Illustrations. (Longmans & Co.)—It is now more than five years since Count Teleki and Lieut. von Höhnell returned from the memorable expedition which did so much to enlarge our knowledge of Eastern Africa, and in the course of which they visited the now famous mountains of Kenia, Kilimanjaro, and Mero, discovered two lakes, and confirmed the existence of active volcanoes far in the interior. Much has happened since that time. Lieut. Höhnell himself, in the company of Mr. Chanler, has paid a second visit to Eastern Africa, which nearly cost him his life; localities which at the time of his first visit were still in the sole occupation of natives have become the scenes of European activity. Still, much of the country first explored by Count Teleki's expedition has not been visited since, and even with respect to the remainder our knowledge is as yet far from complete, and any additional trustworthy information should be welcomed. To English readers the work possesses additional interest, as it deals with a part of Africa whose development will tax British energies for some time to come. It is by no means a book written by a sportsman for sportsmen, for although some space is allotted to exciting encounters with big game, the bulk of the volumes is occupied with information of a useful character, and more especially with an account of the native tribes. That there are districts of exceeding fertility and promise in this part of British Africa is brought home to his readers by the author, who visited Kikuyu and the region of Kenia, where the adventurous "Freelanders" propose to establish their Utopian colony. But thousands of square miles are an utter waste. For fifty-four consecutive days the expedition marched through a region devoid of vegetation and other resources, even drinkable water being found only at long intervals; and when retracing its steps no porter carried less than 110 pounds of the supplies which had been secured among the friendly Roshiat at the northern extremity of Lake Rudolf, whilst one man actually struggled along under a weight of 148 pounds, besides carrying his mat and cooking pot. There are 179 illustrations, many of them from photographs and of considerable merit, those of native types being more especially successful. The large-scale maps of the German edition are likewise inserted, as also the scientific appendices. The translation leaves little to be desired.

The World's Highway, with some First Impressions whilst Journeying Along It. By Mrs. Archibald Dunn. (Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mawson, Swan & Morgan; London, Gay & Bird.)—A pleasant surprise awaits the reader, and especially the critic, who may take up this volume expecting, not unnaturally, only another of those rapid and commonplace diaries which assume to be legitimate works of travel. Mrs. Dunn has considerable gifts both of observation and of description; her powers of word-painting, as shown in her enthusiastic descriptions of Cingalese or American scenery, and in her warm but not uncritical admiration of Japanese art, are exceptional; and the reader is throughout pleasantly aware of a strong but unobtrusive personality, and of an equally strong and half-suppressed sense of humour. She hails from Northumberland; we might have credited her with a still more northerly origin but for a libellous comparison of the bagpipes with the hideous discords of the Eastern conch shell. It is not necessary to agree with all her conclusions. She is a zealous Roman Catholic, and finds throughout her journey the evidences of that faith more prominent than other travellers might do. She is severe upon the Buddhists (whom she persistently misspells "Bhud-dist"). "Bhudda" himself, she admits, if he had lived in the time of our Lord, would have been a great saint; but surely his saintliness is not lessened by this disadvantage! His moral teaching, she says, is barren, because it lacked the sanctions of Christianity; but she is never weary of asserting that consideration and thoughtfulness for others form the basis of Japanese life, and she emphatically contrasts this charming unselfishness with the hardened self-seeking of the Christian American. A somewhat longer investigation would probably have disclosed a large fund of human nature common to the Yankee and the Jap. These rapid generalizations made after a few days' or weeks' acquaintance with a people are, however, a mistake which other travellers share with our author. But she is fairly awed against her will by the great statue of the Daibutsu. While carried away at times by the extreme beauty of Japanese art, she has a haunting doubt how far the feeling for art among the Japanese is true and real. Admitting their "illimitable invention of design," she points out that their motives are essentially limited. They have endless variations on such combinations as lions and peonies, storks and pines, stags and maples, tigers and bamboos, which become at last, she thinks, conventional. She finds, moreover, throughout all their art, "a childish and grotesque vein." Then, again, as in the tombs of the Shoguns, you find, she tells us, coarseness and vulgarity side by side with supreme excellence. Certainly, as she says, they go very far astray when they leave their own lines, as in their approval of third-rate European furniture and decorations, to say nothing of their adoption of our costume. It seems to us, however, that even now there are artists in Japan whose originality and true feeling for art cannot thus be gainsaid. The dwarfing and distorting of their plants and the artificiality of their gardens almost make her doubt their love for flowers and for nature. "They would dwarf their mountains if they could." But when crossing an American prairie in full flower she admits that "if the Japanese possessed one square acre of such, the whole nation would make pilgrimages to it, and bring lanterns and green tea, and sit around by day and by night, offering up a sacrifice of admiration to the floral beauties to which they have such a devotion." We have not space to follow our author in her tour through America. It will be seen that her admiration for things Japanese is, in some directions, qualified. But the sudden change from these to the raw and tasteless buildings in the American townships, the rough manners or absence of manners, and other social and æsthetic drawbacks, all wittily described, so ruffled her feelings that she withdrew all these reservations, and as fresh grievances assail her she ruefully and half seriously exclaims, "What would Japan say to this?" Where so much is good we cannot but notice careless spelling, chiefly of the names of plants. Among these vegetable curiosities we find "wysteria," "pyrrhus japonica," "polygnum," "spirea," and "arbutia." Per contra, a well-known architect is quoted as "Violet le Duc." And it would be better to say "the American type" than la type Americaine!

A DESCRIPTION of various expeditions into a country whose boundaries are as indefinite as its valleys are unhealthy will be found in Chin-Lushai Land, by Surgeon-Lieut. Col. A. S. Reid (Thacker & Co.). The locality is described by Col. Woodthorpe (Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society, 1889, p. 200) as lying south of Manipur and west of Burma—"a mass of lofty hills, running in parallel ridges north and south.....inhabited by the tribes known as Chins, Lushais, Shendus, and Kukis, all, I imagine, closely allied. As the Lushais used to raid on our eastern frontier, and do still on the Chittagong border, so do the Chins raid on Burma." These raids and the desire to extend our surveys and knowledge of the country have led to several expeditions, which seem to have much resembled those of former days on another frontier which excited the just anger of Sir Charles Napier, who thus described them: "March to top of hill No. 1; lose some men; get there. Enemy waiting on top of hill No. 2; go there; more men killed and wounded; more provisions gone; large hospitals; long way for the 'tommy' [food] to follow. Enemy on No. 3; march there; more killed; more difficulty," &c.; the result at the end being at best indecisive, and at worst disastrous. The author has not made so much use as he might have of the geographical information, scanty as it is, which has already been collected; but his book is welcome as a contribution to our imperfect knowledge of the country and of its inhabitants. They practise curious ceremonies for cementing friendship, which recall those in Africa known as the rites of blood brotherhood; and like other gentle savages they seem to have developed an excellent talent for circumventing the unsuspecting Britisher, and for evading the terms which his victories enabled him to impose. In one instance a village was fined Rs. 10,000, and an annual subsidy of two elephant tusks and ten silk sheets or their equivalent. The chiefs flatly declined to consider the yearly tribute, and were very doubtful about paying the fine even in part, because, they urged, first, they had no money; second, they could not make it; and third, if they did pay everything away as fine or tribute nothing would remain to live on. Excellent reasons for non-compliance, which, we are told, greatly astonished the English general. The book is fairly printed, and there are some tolerable illustrations, but the maps, photolithographed at Calcutta, leave much to be desired. Being detached from known countries, they are puzzling to persons not familiar with the locality, and they are made needlessly obscure by the dark shading of the hills.

A Japanese Interior. By Alice M. Bacon. (Gay & Bird.)—In her 'Japanese Girls and Women' Miss Bacon had already shown that she knows how to write, and not a page of the present volume will be found dull, especially by those readers to whom Japan is, happily, still a novelty, although few pages are other than trivial, in subject, it must be added, rather than in treatment. The title itself is a misnomer. Of Japanese interiors the book scarcely gives a glimpse; what it does record are the not uncommon experiences of a "school-marm" (of themselves scarcely worth recording) in the quondam capital of the Tycoon, during the year 1888 and part of 1889. Her pupils were "noble girls" and "peeresses," in "ugly foreign dress," all "silent and orderly," given to "standing like statues," and undistinguished apparently by a trace of individuality; and this is all, practically, we are told about them. Children and women, boys and men, the impression the Japanese make upon most foreigners is that in the Dawn-Land life is not taken in earnest, but is rather a semblance than a reality, played out upon a narrow stage by queer-looking, oblique-eyed, yellow-faced marionettes. Of course behind all this there is a strong and gathering current of national life, and it is just of this current we would fain know something, but can get no knowledge. Mr. Lefcadio Hearn perhaps knows it, he must at all events see it; but it does not interest him, and he will not describe it. What strikes one most after reading Miss Bacon's volume is that at bottom the Japanese are very much what they used to be: the officials wear heavily gilded coats instead of silk jackets and trousers, the kago has given way to the railroad car, and armour and bows and arrows to ugly German uniforms and far-sighted rifles, but—save only among a very few, to be counted in hundreds, perhaps in scores—new Japan is still largely old Japan writ badly and shorn of its pagantry and picturesqueness. In a word, as the author herself says, "the book is more the picture of the life of one foreigner among the Japanese than an authority on Japan in general or on any particular phase of life there." As such it has its value, and in addition the account given of the assassination of Viscount Mori, sometime Japanese Minister in London, of his funeral, and of the impression the tragedy made upon the Tokio public is not without historical interest.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. MURRAY publishes, under the title A Policy of Free Exchange, a collection of essays by various writers, edited by Mr. Thomas Mackay. Mr. Henry Dunning MacLeod writes on the science of economics and its relation to free exchange. The most interesting essays in the volume are the last two, the writers of which are not in complete sympathy with the first seven, who all hold views more or less tending in the direction of those advocated by the Liberty and Property Defence League. Mr. Bernard Mallet writes on the principle of progression in taxation, a subject which has great interest at the present moment, when we are all of us expecting to have our money taken under the most approved form for naval and other deficits; and Mr. Alfred Lyttelton contributes a valuable essay on the law of trade combinations. Mr. Bernard Mallet is the most suggestive of all the writers in the volume. He shows how the old view of taxation being solely defensible for the sake of revenue is giving way in some quarters to a desire to use taxation for the purpose of bringing about an equalization of incomes, and how this change is assisted by the wish for economy being now in the United Kingdom far less powerful than it was. He then proceeds to discuss both the abstract principle of progression, and its practical value as a method of taxation. He discusses the views of Mill, and shows that the principle of taxation in proportion to benefit enjoyed, and that of taxation according to ability to pay, are both of them somewhat vague and inconclusive as regards the particular question now at issue. Mr. Mallet then discusses the view of Jevons, and, having shown that it constitutes a certain justification of the principle of progression, he goes on to consider the possibility of fixing a limit to the principle of progression and an equitable rate of graduation, and reaches the conclusion that moderate graduation is unproductive, while graduation, if excessive, tends to defeat its object. He thinks that both fears and hopes with regard to the principle are exaggerated, and that if used in moderation it may be useful in a limited degree. Mr. J. W. Fortescue has an article on 'State Socialism and the Collapse in Australia,' which contains a most exaggerated picture of the financial state of things which prevails in connexion with the great colonies, for no other epithet can be applied to the assertion that Victoria and New South Wales are bankrupt. That there have been heavy losses in connexion with those colonies is, of course, true, but their public credit, as measured by that of similar states throughout the world, stands very high, and justly so when their resources and their assets are considered; and although those financial authorities who assert that their public securities may stand too high at present prices may be able to produce some evidence upon their side, yet this state of things is very different from that which is implied in the word bankruptcy, and the ability of these colonies to make both ends meet, which is the foundation of good finance, is vastly greater than that possessed by Italy, and even by some others among the great powers.

MRS. TOWNSHEND MAYER has republished in two volumes a series of papers, originally contributed to Temple Bar, entitled Women of Letters (Bentley & Son). Their appearance may be cordially commended, since they form most readable summaries of various more or less famous autobiographies and memoirs. Mrs. Mayer has professedly eschewed criticism, but what little there is seems sensible enough, though a trifle obvious. Her chief merits consist in a keen eye for an interesting extract, and an urbane tolerance of human frailties. On the other hand, she has a tendency to quote somewhat inept remarks from second-rate authorities. Mrs. Mayer has been less successful with the characters of the Stuart and early Georgian times—the Duchess of Newcastle, for instance, and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu—than with Mrs. Inchbald and Lady Morgan. However, the sketches, on the whole, exhibit considerable insight into character and a creditable amount of research. It seems by no means impossible that some of Mrs. Mayer's readers may turn to the original authorities, and thus embark upon a most stimulating course of study. In any case they will acquire sufficient information about some celebrated ladies whose works appear distinguished indeed beside the average novel of to-day.

MESSERS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS send us Authors and their Public in Ancient Times, by Mr. G. Haven Putnam. The preface informs the reader that this book was originally intended "to form a preliminary chapter, or general introduction, to a history of the origin and development of property in literature," i.e. of author's copyright. As it turned out, however, that copyright was unknown to Greek or Roman law, the notes here collected amount to no more than an account of the book trade in antiquity, compiled from Birt's 'Antikes Buchwesen' and other well-known authorities. Certainly this is, in most respects, the fullest description of the Greek and Roman book trade which has yet appeared in English, but it is in want of revision by a competent classical scholar. Mr. Putnam's Latin is obviously better than his Greek, but he does not profess to know much of either tongue. In fact, his pages teem with all sorts of misprints and mistakes, which argue lack of acquaintance with ancient history and literature. A few specimens will suffice. Speaking of boustrophedon writing, Mr. Putnam says: "Among the earlier specimens of this method are the laws of Solon (about 610 B.C.) and the Sigeon inscription (about 600 B.C.)." In a note on rhapsodes he says: "The word is by some authorities derived from ῥάβδος, a staff—just as we have a staff in music." He refers to the "poem" of Prodicus on 'The Choice of Hercules,' to Konehylus, Lycias, Nichomachus, and other strange writers. He quotes from the "tenth satire" of Martial (meaning the 74th Epigram of Book X.) these curious lines:—

*Non Hybla, non me speciter caput Nitus,
Hec quæ paludes delicta Pomptinas
Et arce olivi spectat non Betis.*

Such mistakes as these do not matter much in Chautauqua circles, but there are errors in the book which are more important. For instance, the reader would certainly gather that in ancient Greece poetry was not paid for. This is a most pernicious doctrine, especially when preached by a publisher.

THE second series of Cambridge Prize Poems, 1858-93 (Gibbings & Co.), is singularly inferior to the first. Mr. Myers's two contributions have been omitted at his own request. Mr. Sidney Colvin's is the most pleasing of the remainder.

MESSERS. SAMPSON LOW & Co. have added to their reprint of Mr. Clark Russell's novels that popular tale John Holdnorth, Chief Mate.—Miss Duffus Hardy's clever story A New Othello has been included in Messrs. Jarrold & Sons' series of three-and-sixpenny novels.—Prof. Nichol's monograph on Carlyle in the "English Men of Letters" has been reissued in a cheap form by Messrs. Macmillan. The same firm send us a reprint of Mr. Maurice's sermons on The Acts of the Apostles. They were first published after the lamented author's decease.

Mr. T. B. Browne's volume The Advertiser's A B C is bulky, but incomplete. He professes to give a list of the scales of the London weeklies, and he leaves out the Athenæum and Notes and Queries.—A much more handy volume is Willing's British and Irish Press Guide, which has reached its twenty-first year.—We have nothing but praise for the Handbook of Jamaica, the joint work of Mr. Munson and Mr. Roxburgh (Stanford).

We have on our table Life of J. G. Whittier, by W. J. Linton (Scott).—Selections from the Essays of Francis Jeffrey, edited by L. E. Gates (Boston, U.S., Ginn & Co.).—Vellutius Patricius, Book II. Chap. XLI.—CXXXI., edited by F. E. Rockwood (Boston, U.S., Leach & Co.).—Key to Principles of Composition, by P. BENYOWSKY'S TRAVELS.

Moray House, Anglesey, Gwynedd, March 19, 1894.

YOUR reviewer, in his kind notice of my edition of Benyowsky's "Memoirs," rightly remarks that "any narrative of the adventurer's life is incomplete without his later experiences in Madagascar—a theme which might well have had attraction for the biographer (in the Hakluyt series) of Francis Leguat." Those who may refer to my "Historical Sketch of Madagascar" at the beginning of my work on that island, published by Macmillan in 1886, will see that the celebrated Hungarian hero, pauze Maurus Jokai, was therein styled "a charlatan" (p. 19), and it was with an idea of justifying this expression that I suggested to the publisher of the "Adventure Series" the republication of the Count's memoirs as long ago as 1890. In my postscript to "Robert Drury's Journal" in that series, which appeared four years ago, I remarked: "Rochon has subsequently given the curious story of La Bigorne, and the true aspect of the most wonderful romance woven by the Hungarian desperado, self-styled the Baron Maurice Augustus Aladar de Benyowsky." In fact, Mr. Fisher Unwin will bear me out when I state that I have in vain urged him to publish the second portion of Benyowsky's memoirs, which could not be included in a book strictly limited to 400 pages. My notes on this part of the adventurer's career, contrasting his philanthropic words with his rascally deeds, his own version of his exploits compared with the actual facts recorded by men above suspicion, need only a publisher to fully vindicate my contempt for Benyowsky's "accuracy and honesty"; but I may say that when I first looked at Benyowsky's memoirs I was prejudiced, if anything, in his favour, having been trustful of Ellis, Copland, and others who have implicitly believed in his good faith. With regard to the introduction to the Count's memoirs being written in the third person, that is only a matter of form; the early biography has been written by the Count himself, and the latter portion only given in the shape of a journal.

With reference to the "omissions" complained of, again I must refer to my publisher's instructions. As a Hakluyt editor I should prefer a most rigorous reprint in full, but the inexorable demands of space compelled ruthless slashing out, so that if all the lacuna had even been indicated every page would have been strewn with stars and dashes. In a popular work this was inadmissible. Sometimes, on the other hand, we "hack editors" have to supply matter to make up the deficiency to the required tale of bricks without straw. For instance, to "Robert Drury," when it was finished, I had to supply "by return of post" to the printer fifty pages of letterpress. This I promptly sent back in the short delay given, with, I trust, good results. So critics must be merciful to us poor sinners!

SALES.

MESSRS. SOTHERBY, WILKINSON & HODGE sold the following books between March 9 and 13 from different collections: Burton's Arabian Nights, with the Supplement, 16 vols., 20s. Dibdin's Tour in France and Germany, 3 vols., 1821, 1821, 1821. Selby's British Ornithology, 181. 10s. Ince and Mayhew's Universal System of Household Furniture, 25l. Britannia, 1840 to 1854 (omitting 1849), 11l. 5s. Ireland, Life of Napoleon Bonaparte, 1828, 19l. 10s. Comic Almanack, 1835 to 1863, 16l. 10s. A nearly complete set of Dickens's Works, mostly first editions, 122l. 1s. A small ornamental case of books from Napoleon's Library at St. Helena, 50l. Challenger Reports, 48 vols., 52l. P. Egan's Life in London, uncut, 1821, 11l. 10s. Lydie, Euphues, the Anatomic of Wit, 1623, and Euphues and his England, 1623, in 1 vol., 10l. Blumfeld, History of Norfolk, 5 vols., 1739, 22l. Taciti Opera, Venice (1470), 16l. 10s. Shakespeare, Works, second folio (13) in. by 9 in., 1632, 60l.

The autograph manuscript of Scott's Life of Napoleon Buonaparte, sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on the 12th inst., realized 198 guineas, and was happily bought by a Scotchman.

A notable decline in value seems to have occurred in Sir Walter Scott's Border Antiquities, which was published in two volumes, quarto, about eighty years ago, at 9l., large-paper copies at 16l. 16s. It does not often appear in the sale-room; but a large-paper copy, in morocco binding, has just been sold by auction for the small sum of 11. 2s.

RARE EDITIONS.

Edinburgh, March 26, 1894.

I HASTEN to assure Mr. W. E. Pollard that I made no slip of the pen in stating that 'Guy Fawkes' was published in Ainsworth's Magazine. The novel appeared in that periodical in 1849, with reprints of the original Cruikshank etchings. Of course every one knows that the work was originally published in Bentley's Miscellany (1840); but I purposely neglected to refer to that issue, wishing to accentuate the fact of the novel having appeared later on in another magazine.

Apart from the question of prices, upon which we had better agree to differ, Mr. Slater in his letter makes no attempt to explain away other glaring inaccuracies and misstatements, and declines to be put right about any of them. With permission, and for the possible benefit of other collectors, I will give one or two more instances of defects in his work. At p. 2 the author refers to a memoir of Ainsworth by Laman Blanchard printed in the 1857 edition of 'Rookwood.' I have not seen this edition, and there is no copy of it in the Advocates' Library here; but as Blanchard died in February, 1845, the memoir must have been a reprint of that which he wrote for the Mirror in 1842. Why not at once refer the reader to the Mirror, which is probably easy of access at any public library, rather than to an obscure edition of one of Ainsworth's novels? Again, at p. 9, the reader is led to believe that C. J. Apperley (Nimrod) and Mr. Surtees are one and the same person; and on p. 10 'The Miser's Daughter,' first octavo edition, is said to have a portrait of the author by Findon. There is no portrait in this edition, nor any reference to one, as mentioned by Mr. Slater, in the list of plates. At p. 58 we are told that the Kilmarlock edition of Burns is a small 12mo. book. It is an ordinary 8vo. of 242 pages. At p. 83 Mr. Slater says that 'Is She His Wife?' by Charles Dickens, a small 32mo. book, was issued by a New York publisher in 1877. The book was really published in Boston, and is uniform with 'Mr. Nightingale's Diary' (which Mr. Slater says is a 16mo.), both belonging to what is known as the 'Vest Pocket Library.' At p. 91 the threepenny numbers and sixpenny parts of 'Master Humphrey's Clock' are said both to have had green covers—the numbers had white wrappers only; and at p. 96 'Evenings of a Working Man' is said to be a 16mo. book. It is an 8vo., uniform with the 'Christmas Books.'

The inconsistencies throughout the work are most puzzling, and I can see no reason for specially noticing Bridges and neglecting Bradley (Cuthbert Bode), or, while specially including Leigh Hunt and Edmund Gosse, for leaving out Henry Cockton, Frank Smedley, Douglas Jerrold, or William Scrope. In view of the above facts I ask, Of what value is this work to collectors? Mr. Slater says that had he considered Cruikshank and Leech popular authors (they were not authors) he would have included them in his list. Mr. Slater not being a collector, nor, as far as I know, a dealer, and probably seldom seeing a bookseller's catalogue, how can he possibly be an authority upon works which are specially interesting to collectors only?

I would add, in conclusion, that I am not actuated in my criticisms, as Mr. Slater insinuates, by any fears as to the value of my own collection. I bought all my best items years before the present great prices ruled, and could, therefore, afford to "average" by occasionally completing sets, even if I went to the Mackenzie and Burnett sales to do so.

C. E. S. CHAMBERS.

Bewick House, Gloucester, March 20, 1894.

MR. CHAMBERS is inaccurate in stating that 'Modern Chivalry' has not been published in book form since its appearance in Ainsworth's Magazine. It was published by Macrone in two volumes in 1843, but does not include in this form the last of the five etchings by George Cruikshank illustrating the story as it appeared in the magazine: "Lord Buckhurst overcomes by the Appearance of Apollonia Hurst."

The book is very scarce, and was apparently unknown to the late Mr. G. W. Reid, who does not mention it in his catalogue of the works of George Cruikshank.

H. W. BRUTON.

Liverpool, March 27, 1894.

PERHAPS it may be well to say that both Mr. C. E. S. Chambers and Mr. Wm. Edward Pollard are correct in their statements. 'Guy Fawkes' was published serially in Bentley's Miscellany, commencing January 1st, 1840; and also in Ainsworth's Magazine, beginning July, 1849 (vol. xvi.).

THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.'

THE following is the list of names which it is intended to insert under the letter Q and the first section of R in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' When one date is given, it is the date of death, unless otherwise stated. An asterisk is affixed to a date when it is only approximate. The editor of the 'Dictionary' will be obliged by any notice of omissions addressed to him at Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s, 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. He particularly requests that when new names are suggested, an indication may be given of the source from which they are derived.

"JUNIUS" REVEALED.

H. E. B., an unconvinced Franciscan, writes to us questioning our remark that the love-making between Philip Francis and Miss Giles at Bath in 1771 "is more than problematical," seeing that Francis was a married man with five children and another coming, and his visit to Bath was chiefly to nurse his father, who was seriously ill, and about whom he was writing doleful letters to his wife; and our suggestion that it was "the lively young bachelor Richard Tilghman who flirted with Miss Giles and flattered her with verses which his cousin had written for him." He says:—

"It is unfortunate for this confident solution that when Francis was grieving about his father's sad state and was writing the mournful letters to his wife, Tilghman was in America, having left England in August, 1771. In short, it is evident that the reviewer has confounded one Christmas visit to Bath with another—viz., that of 1771-2 with that of 1770-1. Francis was there in the December of 1771 and in the January as well, as he left it for London on Sunday, January 6th, 1771. It was in the 1770-1 visit (which he paid in company with Tilghman) that his playful attention to the young Bath belle occurred, and the following was the strain in which he was then writing to his wife: 'My father, I think, is wonderfully mended in health and spirits. We all lodge together in a very comfortable, I might say an elegant, house. Upon the whole it promises to be a very agreeable expedition.'" Our correspondent has overlooked the important fact that the date which we dealt with is that chosen by Mr. Francis, Mr. Giles, and Mr. Twisleton. The winter of 1770 may be a more plausible hypothesis, yet, even then, Francis wrote in the most uxorious terms to his wife, as will be seen by those who read the remainder of the letter quoted above. Still, if our correspondent's comments are accepted, the result is not a demonstration that Philip Francis was Junius.

Mr. W. E. Pollard writes from Hertford:—
 "In noticing 'Junius' Revealed' in the Athenæum of the 17th inst. your reviewer quotes the version of the verses sent to Miss Giles as given in Parkes and Merivale's 'Memoirs' of Sir Philip Francis. In the quotation are the words 'a party was assembled at Youngsbury in Essex.' Youngsbury is in Hertfordshire, rather more than two miles north of Ware, and, as the crow flies, not quite three-quarters of a mile east of the old coach road to Cambridge and to the North through Royston. Daniel Giles, owner of Youngsbury, was the brother of the Mrs. King who 'had been a Miss Giles,' and through her daughter Louisa Giles King, who became the wife of Sir Christopher Fuller, the estate came to the Fullers, now Giles-Fullers, the present owners of Youngsbury."

This illustrates the untrustworthiness of the facts put forward in support of the contention that Sir Philip Francis was Junius.

While we are dealing with this matter we may correct an obvious slip at the beginning of our first notice. For "he showed Mr. Francis" read "Mr. Francis showed him."

Literary Gossip.

MR. NORMAN GALE, who is an ardent follower of the game, has just seen through the press the proofs of a volume entitled 'Cricket Songs.' Messrs. Methuen & Co. are the publishers.

GENERAL MEREDITH READ, F.S.A., who was formerly in the diplomatic service of the United States, and his relative the Rev. Compton Reade, Rector of Kinchester, Hereford, the nephew (?) and biographer of Charles Reade, the novelist, have prepared for publication memorials of the Reade (or Read) family in England and America. Two branches of this family were transplanted to America, from one of which, as recently pointed out in our columns by General Meredith Read, George Washington was descended.

MR. W. E. HENLEY has retired from the conduct of the National Observer, which he has edited for the last five years and a half. The journal will in future be in the hands of Mr. J. E. Vincent, the author of the life of the late Duke of Clarence. It is said that under his control the journal will be devoted to the advocacy of Tory Democracy, as understood by Lord Dunraven. Mr. Vincent was formerly connected with the Times.

THE Committee has come to the conclusion that the Home Reading Union cannot be made self-supporting, as the fees have to be kept at a very low figure, especially in the section for working men and women and in that for young people. The debts of the Union have been extinguished by a donation of 200*l.* from Mr. Yerburch, but an appeal for additional subscriptions is to be circulated. The Welsh Students' Union has temporarily collapsed for lack of funds. On the other hand, the circles—such as that at Oxford House—for which a grant was made by the Trustees of the City Charities are doing well, and the Gilchrist Trustees have given 50*l.* to pay the fees of indigent members. The Shakespeare Course has proved so popular that it is to be made one of the regular courses of the Union. The summer meeting at Ilkley attracted over five hundred students.

EARLY in April Messrs. Richard Bentley & Son will publish a new work by Mrs. Alfred Marks, on which she has been engaged during the greater part of the last five years. It is called 'Thorough,' and deals with the Irish rebellion of 1641 and the events which led to the transplantation of Connaught.

WE are asked to state that, the minimum of 210 members having now been reached, the Council of the Bibliographical Society has resolved to use the power conferred on it in January last at the first annual meeting, and on May 19th will declare the roll of the Society closed, and thenceforth new members will be elected only to fill vacancies. Any one who wishes to join the Society before the roll is closed is invited to communicate with the honorary secretary, Mr. A. W. Pollard, 13, Cheniston Gardens.

MESSRS. METHUEN are going to publish a new historical novel by Mr. Stanley Weyman, author of 'A Gentleman of France.' The story is entitled 'Under the Red Robe,' and Richelieu is one of the chief personages.

THE death is announced at an advanced age of the Rev. A. J. D'Orsey, formerly Professor of Public Reading at King's College, London. Mr. D'Orsey was for twenty years or so a teacher in the High School of Glasgow, but becoming a ten years' man at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, he was appointed Lecturer on English Literature at that college on obtaining his B.D. degree. He was for some three or four years English chaplain at Madeira, and wrote a Portuguese grammar as well as an English grammar and other works. His latest publication was a volume on the 'Portuguese Discoveries in Africa.'

MR. W. A. CLOUSTON's 'History of Hieroglyphic Bibles,' which we mentioned some time back, is now in the hands of the binder. The first English version of these curious juvenile picture-books (for which Thomas Bewick is believed to have furnished some of the cuts) has been traced by Mr. Clouston, through a Dutch version made from the German, to an Augsburg source, 'Geistliche Herzens Einbildungen,' or 'Spiritual Heart-Fancies,' 1687. By including an account of the principal block-books of the fifteenth century, and furnishing a full description of Lord Denbigh's unique illuminated MS. Latin Bible in Rebus, written probably about 1460, and of European books of emblems, the bulk of the volume has been nearly doubled. It contains upwards of thirty facsimile plates and fifty-six quaint cuts, printed from the original blocks used in a "Hieroglyphic Bible" published in London about the year 1810.

MESSRS. CASSELL will issue early in April an authorized English translation by Mr. A. J. Butler of the recently published correspondence of Count Cavour. The proofs of the translation have been read by Count Nigra.

MR. PHILIP FRANCIS, son of the writer of the book on the authorship of the letters of Junius that we reviewed and, we think, refuted the other day, has just presented to the Library of St. Paul's School a copy of Pope's translation of the Iliad (six volumes, 1750) which originally belonged to Dr. Philip Francis, the translator of Horace, some of whose notes and criticisms still remain on the blank leaves. In each volume is written "P. Francis, 1754, of St. Paul's School."

MR. J. F. ROWBOTHAM is writing a history of Rossall School, of which he was once captain. Mr. Heywood is to publish it.

STUDENTS of the gipsies, and especially those who have interested themselves in the history of that race, will have read with regret the announcement of the death, at Paris, on March 1st, of the veteran tsiganeologue M. Paul Bataillard. For the last half century he had devoted his leisure time to the study of the early notices of the presence of gipsies in Europe and their advent in Western Europe in or about the beginning of the fifteenth century. It was his opinion that there have been gipsies in Eastern Europe since prehistoric times, and that it is to them Europe owes its knowledge of metallurgy. Heterodox although this opinion may be, it has recently been observed by Mr. F. H. Groome that "Bataillard's theory is gaining favour with foreign archaeologists, among whom MM. Mortillet, Chantre, and Burnouf had arrived independently at similar conclusions." M. Bataillard, who was in his seventy-eighth year, had long held the position of Archiviste of the Faculté de Médecine of Paris. The results of his studies have been published at various times since 1849, in separate pamphlets as well as in the publications of learned societies.

THE Law Quarterly Review for April will include articles on 'The Case of the Zeta,' by Mr. R. G. Maresden; 'Betterment in its Legal Aspect,' by Mr. P. V. Smith; 'Breach of Promise of Marriage,' by Mr. J. Dundas White; 'A Chapter in the History of the Law of Libel,' by Mr. Joseph R. Fisher; 'Some Recent Decisions concerning "Attempt" and "Intent,"' by Mr. Showell Rogers; and 'Actio Personalis Moritur cum Persona in the Law of Scotland,' by Mr. R. M. Williamson.

AN international exhibition of books, which it is presumed will possess much interest for authors, publishers, and book-sellers, is to be held at Paris in July, remaining open till late in the autumn.

THE Vienna papers record the death, on March 13th, of the Austrian poet Ludwig August Frankl, Ritter von Hochwart. He was born at Chrast, in Bohemia, in 1813. After he had studied medicine in Vienna and taken his degree, he resigned his profession and accepted the situation of Archivdirektor to the Hebrew Community. In 1842 he started the Sonntagsblätter, one of the first art periodicals in Vienna, which was suppressed in the revolutionary conflicts of 1848 on account of Frankl's poems. His first "censurfreie" poem, 'Die Universität,' is said to have had a circulation of half a million copies, and it was set to music by seventeen different composers. The long list of Frankl's later works occupies half a column in the new edition of Brockhaus. He was most benevolent, and erected the Institute for Blind Children on the Hochwart, near Vienna.—From Agram comes the news of the decease of Canon Racki, the biographer of Cyril and Methodius, and the editor of the 'Vetera Monumenta Slavorum Meridionalium Historiam spectantia,' and also author of a work on 'Fiume and Croatia.'

Messrs. WARNE & Co. will shortly publish a fresh volume in the "Tavistock Library," entitled 'Sir Joseph's Heir,' by Capt. Claude Bray.

A NEW edition of Poe's writings is to appear in the United States in ten volumes, edited by Mr. E. C. Stedman and Prof. Woodberry.

SCIENCE

Letters of Asa Gray. Edited by Jane Loring Gray. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

ASA GRAY visited this country on so many occasions and sojourned among us so long that we had come to look on him as one of ourselves. He made friends in all ranks of life, and associated with people of all conditions whom he deemed worth knowing. His personal characteristics were such that he gained as much sympathy by his amiability and singleness of heart as he commanded respect for his ability.

Of this the letters now before us afford ample illustration. They extend almost continuously over his whole life, from childhood to his seventy-eighth year, when his gentle spirit was removed from among us. By their aid, and with only occasional and slight interpolations, the editor has contrived to present an admirable and singularly complete biography of her husband; and she has performed her part with such tact and ability that not only the friends of the late Professor, but the general public also, will find these volumes attractive and interesting.

The life of a professor almost exclusively devoted to botany and its cognate sciences, without any particularly stirring incident in it, might not be considered likely to contain much that is of general interest. In this case, however, such a notion would be erroneous, and we venture to think that the general reader will find these volumes as interesting as they certainly will be to botanists, who will find in them the elements of the history of their science for three-fourths of a century. We may in this place pass over the record of Gray's earlier years, as told partly by himself in the form of an autobiographical fragment, and begin our notice with his first visit to Europe in 1838-9. In fact, this may be called the veritable starting-point of his career, to which all that preceded had been introductory. Gray landed at Liverpool on December 1st, 1838, after a passage of twenty-one days, he being then in his twenty-ninth year. He went to Chester, with the strangeness of which the young American was naturally much impressed, but he made no long stay, and pushed on to Glasgow, where he became the guest of Sir William and Lady Hooker. Hooker received his young friend with the cordiality and helpfulness which he always manifested towards beginners and aspirants, and here also began a lifelong friendship with Dr., now Sir Joseph, Hooker, at that time pursuing his medical studies in the university. With the Hookers Gray worked, as he says, very hard for three weeks, and then left, enriched with specimens and amply provided with introductions to the botanists of London and of the Continent. His first stopping-place was Edinburgh, where he made the acquaintance of Greville and other botanists of the time. In the middle of January, 1839, Gray reached London, and immediately became immersed in the botanical society of the day. The Hookers had preceded him from Glasgow, and, either in their company or by himself, he visited Robert Brown, Lambert, Bentham, Lindley, Darwin, Owen, and many others. He did not confine himself exclusively to botanical circles, but was a diligent and observant sight-seer, and keenly interested in the theological controversies of the day. Amongst other things he records going to the Royal Society to hear a paper read

"of the Hon. Fox Talbot's on the power of objects not only to sit for, but to draw their own portraits, which has just been making a great noise in France. It is done by the influence of the light of the sun upon paper prepared by nitrate or chloride of silver. Talbot seems to have found out all about it long ago, but the French have published first. I will write the doctor [Torrey] more particularly about it, and send the Athenæum containing the account when it appears."

At the House of Lords he notices that the word "lengthy," which "was then called an Americanism, was pretty well naturalised, as Brougham used it several times and Scarlett more than once. Lord Palmerston the other evening used the word disculpate instead of exculpate, which, I fancy, is rather modern English."

In March Gray proceeded to Paris, where he repeated his London experiences in a different form. Decaisne, Adrien de Jussieu, Gay, Webb, Delessert, Brongniart, and others played the part of hosts to their young American associate. Writing to Mrs. Torrey at this time, he remarks:—

"There is little danger of my being spoiled in Paris by being over-polished. In London one must take care to be always comme il faut. There I took pains to keep myself rather spruce, which I have continued here from the mere force of habit!!! But gentlemen in Paris dress any how; they don't pay half the attention to the matter it receives in England; with the ladies it is perhaps different."

Leaving Paris in the middle of April, the traveller made his way to Lyons, Avignon, and Montpellier, where he found much to interest him, and where Lady Bentham received him with much kindness. But we need not follow him in his further passage through Italy to Vienna and Munich, and thence to Switzerland, Germany, and Berlin, where he spent a month. Everywhere he was cordially welcomed; everywhere he managed to mix work and pleasure in a most agreeable fashion; everywhere he came into contact with and made friends of the leading botanists. It follows from this that the portions of the volume dealing with this tour, as with others subsequently, really form an excellent sketch of the history of European botany of the period. From 1840 to 1850 Gray was steadily at work, having been appointed professor at Harvard and Director of the University Botanic Garden in 1842, near about the same time that his friend Sir William Hooker undertook the direction of the Royal Botanic Garden at Kew. In 1850 Gray visited Europe for the second time, on this occasion accompanied by his wife. To a large extent the course of procedure was the same as on the former visits; but he was always extending his friendships. During this visit, not to speak of botanical acquaintances, he met R. W. Church, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's, then Fellow of Oriel; Burgeon of Oriel, Jacobson, Bishop of Chester, and others. He also renewed his intimacy with Joseph Hooker, who had just then returned from his adventurous journey in Sikkim. He visited the great Exhibition of 1851, where he was disgusted to find the American section badly equipped, though he admits that "where anything is quite poor and commonplace the exhibitor is sure to make it up in brag, in which, it must be confessed, we do 'beat all creation.'" In September of that year Dr. and Mrs. Gray were again at home.

We have already mentioned the friendship with the Rev. R. W. Church, commenced on the occasion of the second journey in Europe, and allude to the circumstance again because a large portion of the second volume is filled with letters to that gentleman. These letters, like those to Lord Justice Fry, are specially interesting as from one cultured man to another equally cultivated in a totally different department of knowledge. He tells the future dean that he read with interest, not unmingled with concern, Baden Powell's and Wilson's articles in 'Essays and Reviews,' and is evidently uneasy about the latitudinarianism of many members of the University of Oxford. The orthodoxy of Gray proved a valuable aid to the cause of what is now called Darwinism. Darwin was an intimate friend and frequent correspondent of his, but the Harvard professor always maintained his own Evangelical tendency, and his advocacy of design as a factor in the organization of plants and animals, while he staunchly defended his friend and his friend's book, and gained for it an unprejudiced reception in quarters where otherwise it would have been condemned unread. "The moment I understood your premises," he writes to Darwin,

"I felt sure you had a real foundation to hold on. Well, if one admits your premises, I do not see how he is to stop short of your conclusions as a probable hypothesis at least"; and in a letter to Church he "protests against the folly of those who would, it would seem, go on to fire away the very ramparts of the citadel in the defense [sic] of needless outposts."

In 1861 began the great struggle between North and South. Gray was intensely patriotic, but, as his letters to Church show, he was always clear-sighted and determined, never vindictive. This is what the peaceful follower of the "amabilis scientia" writes to Engelmann:—

"I pray Congress to put on taxes five per cent. direct upon property and income, and heavy indirect besides. What is property? I would fight till every cent is gone, and would offer my own life freely; so I do not value the lives or property of rebels above my own. God bless you."

And again in a letter to Darwin:—

"If it is the old question of struggle for life, good feeling has not much to do with it; the weak must go to the wall, because it can't help it. Blessed are the strong, for they shall inherit the earth."

In another letter he says, speaking of his countrymen:—

"The feelings of many are very hostile, and they would like to be strong that they might show it. Those of others, who have been exceedingly fond of England, always defending her when possible, and these are mine, are that we must be strong to be secure and respected—natural selection quickly crushes out weak nations..... Naturalists, &c., being enlightened people, can be as intimate as they like; but nationally let each say, 'God bless you,' and let us see as little of each other as possible, each going our [sic] own way."

These Carlylean or Bismarckian utterances were prompted by the unfortunate attitude of this country to the North and by the probability of the outbreak of war between the two Anglo-Saxon nations.

In spite of the distractions caused by the war, Gray kept up his European correspondence, especially with Darwin, and it is interesting to see how eager Gray was in following and repeating Darwin's experiments and observations on insect-digesting plants, and on the adaptations for cross-fertilization and for climbing. It is interesting to read such passages as this from Dr. Farlow:—

"Dr. Gray hardly ever passed in or out of the herbarium without stroking (patting them on the back by way of encouraging them, it almost seemed) the tendrils of the climbers on the walls and porch; and on the announcement that a student had discovered another case of cross-fertilization in the garden, he would rush out bareheaded and breathless, like a schoolboy, to see the thing with his own critical eyes." All this is particularly interesting to read because the main facts had been known to botanists long before Darwin, and to few better than to Gray himself. It needed the genius of our great naturalist to show their collective and reciprocal significance, and to dovetail them in their proper places as illustrations of the great principles of evolution and of the survival of the fittest.

In 1868 Gray was once more in Europe, paying with Mrs. Gray a round of visits to Mr. Church, Tyndall, and Darwin (at whose house he stayed with Hooker). In November he proceeded to Paris and thence to Egypt, passing the winter on the Nile, and returning through Italy, Germany, and Switzerland to England, following the same routine of work and pleasure as circumstances permitted, and not returning to the United States till November, 1869. In the following year the Franco-German War broke out, and the course of events was watched with great eagerness by Gray, who had so recently renewed his intercourse with his old associates in both countries. Gray's judgment was favourable to the German cause, but his sympathies were with France, and he lamented sorely the straits and humiliation through which that country had to pass.

In 1872 came a journey in the mountains of California and Colorado, including an ascent of Gray's Peak. In the following year Gray resigned his professorship after thirty-one years of service, and passed the winter of 1873 in Florida. In 1876 he spent a holiday in North Carolina, which he visited also in 1879. In the autumn of 1877 he was again in Colorado and California, accompanied during part of the time by Sir Joseph Hooker, in whose company he travelled some nine thousand miles. Three years later he once more sailed for Europe with Mrs. Gray, passing the autumn in France and Spain, devoting the winter to hard work at Kew, and visiting Italy in the spring with Sir Joseph and Lady Hooker. In 1885 he travelled in Mexico and California, and in 1887 paid his last visit to Europe, going over much of the old ground and being interested in the celebrations connected with the Queen's jubilee. On this occasion he was formally "doctored" by the universities of Cambridge, Edinburgh, and Oxford, and took part in the meeting of the British Association at Manchester. Returning to Harvard, he resumed his ordinary habits; but the end was near, and on January 30th, 1888, the pure-souled veteran was laid to his rest. Our notice has assumed the form of a catalogue. The letters are so numerous that we are precluded from citing more of them than we have done, but the reader can readily fill in the framework for himself, and a very agreeable task he will find it.

CAPT. V. LOVETT CAMERON, R.N.

On Easter Monday this renowned African explorer died at Leighton Buzzard from concussion of the brain, brought on by a fall from his horse when returning from hunting with Lord Rothchild's staghounds.

Verney Lovett Cameron was born at Radipole, near Weymouth, on July 1st, 1844. He entered the navy in 1857, and saw service in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, the Red Sea, and on the East Coast of Africa, where he was engaged in chasing Arab slave dhows, and incidentally acquired a fair knowledge of Kiswahili, which subsequently proved of much use to him. After the collapse of the Livingstone Search and Relief Expedition, dispatched by the Royal Geographical Society in 1873, under Lieut. Dawson, partly owing to the "discovery" of the missing explorer by Mr. H. M. Stanley, a second expedition was fitted out under the command of Capt. Cameron. It was the object of this expedition to effect a junction with Dr. Livingstone, to assist him in every way, and to solve some of the problems connected with the hydrography of Central Africa. Capt. Cameron left Zanzibar on February 2nd, 1873, accompanied by Dr. Dillon and Lieut. Cecil Murphy. Soon after he reached Unyamwebe Livingstone's servants arrived there with their master's body, and Lieut. Murphy decided to return with them to the coast. Cameron and Dr. Dillon, however, resolved to go on; but as Dr. Dillon fell ill soon afterwards, and shot himself when delirious from fever, Cameron was alone when he reached Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, on February 21st, 1874. Having surveyed the southern half of the lake and discovered its outlet, the Lukuga, he proceeded to Nyangwe, on the Upper Congo.

Bitterly disappointed at not being able to procure boats for following that river to the sea, Cameron turned to the south. In Urua he met with a Portuguese half-caste, and in his not very desirable company he travelled to the west coast, arriving at Catumbela, near Benguela, on November 7th, 1875, thirty-three months after he had left Zanzibar. The results of this journey at once placed Cameron in the foremost rank of African explorers, and deservedly so, for he had solved the question of the drainage of Lake Tanganyika, thrown much light upon the upper tributaries of the Congo, traversed extensive regions never before visited or described by European travellers, and laid down his route from numerous astronomical observations. In 1876 Capt. Cameron attended the conference of African travellers which met at Brussels under the presidency of the King of the Belgians, and since that time he has taken an active share in the formation of companies founded for the purpose of developing the resources of the continent with whose exploration his name is so intimately connected, the principal among them being the Belgian Katanga Company and the Portuguese Companhia da Zambesia.

In 1878-9 Capt. Cameron visited Cyprus, Syria, and the Valley of the Euphrates, collecting information likely to induce capitalists to embark in the construction of a railway, and in 1882 he accompanied Sir R. F. Burton to Western Africa in "search of gold."

In addition to numerous articles in reviews, Capt. Cameron has published 'Across Africa' (1876), 'Our Future Highway' (1880), and, jointly with Burton, 'To the Gold Coast for Gold' (1883), and also numerous volumes for boys.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

An annular eclipse of the sun will take place on the morning of April 6th, but no part of it will be visible in Western Europe. The line of centrality is, indeed, almost confined to the eastern part of the Asiatic continent, passing from the western side of the Bay of Bengal, through China and Chinese Tartary, into the extreme east of Siberia. The planet Mercury will be at greatest western elongation from the sun on the 10th, and he will be visible just before sunrise about that time in the constel lation Pisces. On the morning of the 4th he will be very near the moon, then within two days of being new. Venus will be at greatest western elongation from the sun on the morning of the 27th; she will be conspicuous as a morning star throughout the month, successively in the constellations Aquarius and Pisces. Mars is also a morning star, situated in Capricornus; but on account of his great southern declination, he never attains any considerable elevation in the sky. Jupiter is still an evening star in the first part of the month in the constellation Taurus, but sets earlier each night, and will gradually cease to be visible; he will be near the moon on the 8th and 9th. Saturn is in Virgo, and in opposition to the sun on the 11th; he will be about 5° due north of the bright star Spica at the end of the month, and in conjunction with the moon (then nearly full) on the 19th.

Mr. F. W. Dyson, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Turner, now Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, as Chief Assistant at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich.

Dr. Gill announces in Astronomische Nachrichten, No. 3219, that Mr. Ray Woods, of the Cape Observatory, has discovered, by comparison of a photograph taken on January 20th with one of last year, that a small star in the constellation Vela is a variable. Subsequent observation showed that while the normal brightness is 7½, this diminishes periodically in a few hours to about 9½, afterwards increasing rapidly again to its usual amount, the total length of period being about 54 22° 19".

We have received the numbers of the Memorie della Società degli Spettroscopisti Italiani for the last three months of 1893, completing vol. xxii. In that for October Prof. Tacchini gives an account of the solar protuberances observed at Rome during the second and third quarters of that year, in which an increase is shown on the whole, though, like the spots, the protuberances were somewhat less numerous in September than in August. There can be little doubt that the maximum epoch of solar activity is past. The principal paper in the November number is one by Dr. Palazzo on the magnetic perturbations in the month of August, 1893, considered in relation to the phenomena of the solar spots. That in the December number is by Prof. Tacchini, on the heliographical latitudes of the solar protuberances as observed at Rome during the first quarter of 1893; and an obituary notice is given, with portrait, of Prof. Wolf, of Zurich. We have since received also the number for January of the present year, containing Prof. Tacchini's observations of the heliographical distribution of the solar spots and other phenomena seen at Rome during the second quarter of 1893. The number for February, which we have still more recently received, contains principally the continuation of Prof. Tacchini's observations of the solar spots and other phenomena to the end of 1893.

SOCIETIES.

ASTATIC.—March 13.—Lord Reay, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a paper by Surgeon-Major Waddell 'On the Secret of Buddha as illustrated by an Ancient Cave Fresco and Tibetan Paintings.' It is well known that the special characteristic of Gotama which made him a Buddha, and distinguished him from the other arhats, was the discovery of the well-known four noble truths and of the twelve-linked chain of cause (otherwise called the wheel of life, the Paticepa Samuppada). The meaning of the noble truths is well ascertained, but that of the wheel of life is still so obscure that the best interpreters have openly confessed their inability to show the connexion between its various links. These are ignorance, conformation, name and form, the senses, contact, sensation, thirst, craving, becoming, birth, old age, and death. It is easy to understand the proposition that, given the sense organs and contact through them with the outside world, there follows sensation, which gives rise to a felt want, a thirst, a craving. But how can ignorance cause conformation, or how can craving produce becoming? and when we find birth nearly at the end of the series, so that it cannot be the birth of the individual to whom the series belong, is it the birth of some one else that is referred to? All these are at present unsolved questions, as we have only the technical terms of the chain as expressed in Pali to guide us, and the authorized traditional interpretation of them preserved in the commentaries has not yet been published and translated. Now there is in the celebrated caves of Ajanta a ruined fresco representing a wheel with figures in twelve compartments on the rim, and hitherto supposed to be a painting of the zodiac. Reproductions of this fresco were in the hands of the audience, and Mr. Waddell also exhibited a large picture he had brought from Tibet of the wheel of life. The comparison of the two showed that the Ajanta fresco was really a painting of the same subject, and the Tibetan interpretation of the figures on the wheel showed what was the traditional meaning attached in Tibet since the ninth century to the difficult technical terms found in the older books. The author also commented on the view of life set out in the wheel and those of Schopenhauer and Hartmann.—An interesting discussion followed, in which Sir W. Hunter, Dr. Gaster, Mr. Arbuthnot, Miss Foley, and others took part.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—March 21.—Mr. A. W. Jones in the chair.—Mr. Sheraton described a curious brass monument, of late date, in Carnarvon Church.—Mr. Earle Way exhibited various coins, mostly Roman, recently found in Southwark; among them was a seventeenth century token for twopenny, issued by a tradesman at Dowgate.—Mrs. Collier produced an Elizabethan love-token ring formed of joined hands.—An exhaustive paper on the history of English parishes was read by Mr. R. Lloyd. After referring to the growth of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire, he showed its increase under Severus, when Christians were allowed to buy land and to build, and that the effect of the edict of 303 for the demolition of churches would have affected Britain and Western Europe. Following the few records of Christianity in Roman Britain, the existence of the faith after the arrival of the Saxons is shown by the antagonism of Augustine and his followers, and by that of the see of York to Canterbury. The work of Archbishop Theodore, a Greek, was dwelt upon at length, and it is to him that the division of England into parishes may be assigned.—An animated discussion followed.—A second paper was read on the discovery of many curious structural features of Saxon and later times, at Repton Church, by Mr. J. T. Irvine. It was illustrated by elaborate plans and drawings.

LINNEAN.—March 15.—Prof. Stewart, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. G. Tumley was admitted and Messrs. J. H. Barkill and J. C. Lisbon were elected Fellows.—Mr. T. Hick was elected an Associate of the Society.—Mr. C. Reid exhibited some cones of Scotch fir, and also some carbonized pine wood from a peat moss at Parkstone, Dorset. He said the pine had become extinct in the south of England after neolithic times, and had been reintroduced only recently. Its extinction was commonly supposed to be due to forest fires. He found that every piece of pine wood embedded in the peat moss was similarly charred, while portions embedded in sand were little altered, and he suggested that the appearance of burning might possibly be due to the action of the growing peat, and have nothing to do with fire.—A discussion followed, in which Messrs. Carruthers, Hanbury, Christy, and others gave reasons for adhering to the older theory.—Mr. Carruthers exhibited a diagrammatic table showing an accurate counting of the annual rings of growth in three gigantic specimens of Wellingtonia (Sequoia gigantea), from which he calculated the age of the trees. A section of one in the British Museum (Natural History), 15 ft. in diameter, which was a living tree when cut down, he estimated to be 1,330 years old. As illustrative of the size to which these trees grow he mentioned that he had measured two in America, one of which was 22 ft. and the other 77 ft. in circumference.—A discussion followed on the conditions which accelerated or retarded growth, and Mr. G. Murray, in reply to a suggestion of Mr. Reid, pointed out that a number of experiments had been made on various trees to test their rate of growth under different conditions of weather and temperature, but that the results varied to such an extent as to afford no basis for sound conclusions.—Mr. A. B. Rendle exhibited the fruit of Melocanna bambusoides from the Mauritius, where it had been introduced, and gave some account of its structure and mode of growth, referring to the figure of it given by Roxburgh in his 'Plants of the Coast of Coromandel' (plate 243) under the name Bambusa baccifera.—Mr. C. B. Clarke gave the substance of a paper 'On Certain Authentic Cyperaceae of Linnaeus,' describing the results of his examination of the type specimens in the Linnaean Herbarium, with suggestions for some rectifications in the nomenclature. Referring incidentally to the history of this herbarium, he regretted the additions which had been made to it since the death of Linnaeus, and the introduction of plants which Linnaeus had never seen.—In the discussion which followed, Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Daydon Jackson explained under what circumstances these additions had been made, and showed that it was antecedent to the collection coming into the possession of the Society, since which time no alteration in its condition had taken place.—Mr. G. Brebner read a paper 'On the Development of the Mucilage-Canals of the Marattiaceae,' in which, with the aid of some excellent lantern slides, he showed that these canals are schizogenous intercellular spaces arising from the separation of cells, and are lined by a persistent epithelium. The secretion is thus the product of the activity of living cells, and not the result of cell-degradation.—An interesting discussion followed, in which Dr. D. H. Scott, Prof. Reynolds Green, and others took part.

ZOOLOGICAL.—March 20.—Prof. G. B. Howes in the chair.—The Secretary exhibited and made remarks on a photograph of a young male Indian bison (Bos gaurus) Major G. S. Roden proposed to send home to the menagerie.—Mr. F. G. Parsons read a paper on the myology of the hystriomorphine and sciurumorphine rodents, and stated that it was based on the dissection of the muscles of examples of twenty-one species of rodents, belonging to many families of the Hystriomorphia and Sciurumorphia, made at the Society's gardens. The results of these dissections had been compared with the writings of other observers, and arranged, firstly under the heads of the different muscles, and secondly under those of the different families. The arrangement of the muscles coincided in a marked manner with the usual classification of the order, and seemed to depend much more upon the affinities of the animals than upon their habits and mode of life. The muscles which seemed most characteristic of the two principal sections were the masticator, the long flexors of the foot, the sterno-scapular, and the digastric. Three genera of the Dipodidae had been examined, and were found to resemble the Hystriomorphia in many respects, while in others they approached the sciurumorphine type.—Communications were read: from Babu Ram Bramha Sanyal, on a rare carnivorous mammal of Borneo (Cynogale bennetti); from Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, on the osteology of certain cranes, rails, and their allies and their affinities;—and from Mr. O. V. Aplin, on the mammals of Uruguay, field-notes made during his recent expedition to that country.

METEOROLOGICAL.—March 21.—Mr. R. Inwards, President, in the chair.—Mr. H. C. Kiddle and Mr. S. R. Lowcock were elected Fellows.—Mr. W. H. Dines read a paper 'On the Relation between the Mean Quarterly Temperature and the Death Rate.' The conclusion of the writer was that a cold winter is unhealthy and a mild winter healthy; and a hot summer is always unhealthy and a cold summer healthy. Mr. Dines also read a paper 'On the Duration and Lateral Extent of Gusts of Wind, and the Measurement of their Intensity.'—Mr. R. H. Scott exhibited a diagram showing some remarkably sudden changes of the barometer in the Hebrides on February 23rd, 1894.—The other paper read was 'On the Calculation of Photographic Cloud Measurements,' by Dr. K. G. Olsson.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.—March 19.—Mr. H. S. Ashbee in the chair.—Mr. H. B. Wheatley read a paper 'On the Bibliography of Chaucer.' He pointed out the necessity of including foreign works dealing with the subject, and also MSS. of the poet's works.—The latter point was emphasised by Dr. Furnival, who continued the discussion.—Mr. A. H. Huth then read a short paper on 'A Bibliography of English Literature,' with special reference to a work of this nature which the Society has in view.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Victoria Institute, 4½.—'Babylonian Exploration.'
- Royal Institution, 8.—'Geological Month.'
- Engineers, 9.—'Gas-holder Construction.' Mr. R. L. Preece.
- Surveyors' Institution, 8.—'Adjourned Discussion on "The Rating of Ground Values".'
- Antiquaries' Club, 8.—'Antiquities.' Mr. A. F. Shand.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Photometry,' Lecture I, Capt. W. D. A. Abney. (Contest Lecture)
- Tues. Royal Institution, 8.—'Electric Illumination.' Prof. J. A. Fleming.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—'Ballot for Members.' 'The Construction of Gas Works.' Mr. C. Hunt.
- Zoologists, 4½.—'Further Field-notes on the Game Animals of Somaliland.' Capt. H. G. Swayne. 'Toward Antiquities of the Upper Madagasc.' Mr. O. Thomas. 'Occurrence of the White Rhinoceros in West-Africa.' Mr. R. T. Coryndon.
- Wed. Microscopical, 8.—'Conversations.'
- British Archaeological Association, 8.—'Rapping Forest and History in Prehistoric Times.' Dr. Wainwright. 'Notes on American Taxidermy.' Mr. A. C. Fryer.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'The Elements of Beauty in Ceramics.' Mr. C. F. Mann.

many Milanese pictures have been ascribed without the least authority. St. Peter (190) and St. Paul (191), by, or attributed to, Parmigiano, are in brown monochrome, as if made for an engraver; they illustrate the grandiose style of the master, and seem to be in excellent condition. They may be reduced versions of the outer sides of the wings of a triptych. Lord Battersea's Virgin and Child (194) bears the name of Da Vinci, and it has, if we mistake not, been engraved as a Da Vinci. Of greater merit and value is the St. Mary Magdalen (195), by A. Solario, lent by Mr. Wickham Flower. It is an excellent example of the painter, nearly, if not quite, intact, admirable in respect to draughtsmanship, delicately modelled to an ivory-like surface, and surpassingly finished. A small panel of the Virgin and Child (198) may be by Correggio, whose name it bears, or by a later and possibly Flemish copyist, to whom may be due the Correggese harmonies of tone and colour, which make true chiaroscuro, and are decidedly charming indeed. Mr. L. Mond's remarkable example of that unequal master Bazzi, St. Jerome (201) in the desert, a life-size figure, deserves study. Its masculine design hardly accords with its laboured execution, and the head of the saint, vigorous and original as it is, is a departure from Bazzi's ordinary taste. The castles on rocky heights in the background, the sea in the mid-distance, and a Roman ruin in front are most interesting. No doubt the whole picture has darkened considerably and, in parts, unequally, so that neither its light and shade nor its chiaroscuro is in anything like its original condition; and consequently the picture is no longer in harmony with itself. Mr. Benson's Luini, the Portrait of a Lady (202), is a noble instance of Milanese art of the finest quality, and, except for the darkening which is so unfortunately frequent in pictures of the school to which it belongs, in excellent condition. The martyr lying along the lady's right arm is one of the curiosities of portraiture. The Portrait of a Man with the Attributes of David, King and Prophet (204), is not in the least like the work of Da Vinci, to whom it is attributed. The execution, though not without power and skill, is heavy, not to say coarse, and its general crudity suggests a much later hand; in fact the motives of the attitude and expression belong to the latter part of the sixteenth century. The technique of some portions is excellent, but it resembles the Brecian rather than the Milanese school. It is difficult to see what suggested the attribution to Leonardo. Lord Rosebery's supposed Bronzino, Portrait of a Man (205), is a picture of great merit, in its original condition, but much too heavily touched, hard, and coarse in handling for Bronzino. It excels in character reading. We presume the Society of Antiquaries' Portrait of B. Liciano di Adriano (209) is ascribed to Jacopo de' Barbari only in default of a better name. Highly interesting, it will reward careful study. Although Lord Northbrook's Virgin and Child (211) bears the name of Giulio Romano on its frame, it is doubtless, as Dr. Waagen suggested and the Catalogue says, by Perino del Vaga, few of whose oil pictures are known. It was formerly in the Cambiaso and Le Brun collections, when it was engraved as a Giulio Romano, and under his name it was exhibited by the late Sir T. Baring, as No. 18 in 1816, and as No. 29 in 1840, at the British Institution. Waagen noticed the fresco-like treatment of the draperies in shot colours, a circumstance which goes to confirm his notion that, though in oil, it is the work of a fresco painter. We doubt much if the Nativity (212) is, as the Catalogue asserts, a Luini, though it may be by a weaker follower of Leonardo, or a Ferrarese, which is more likely; see, however, Gaudenzio Ferrari's Holy Family (216), which is certainly by a leading master of the school of Lombardy. The Virgin and Child and St. John the Baptist (214) is a capital example of Andrea del Sarto's ordinary work, and, like No. 266, 'St. Mary Magdalen,' it is one of his many pot-boilers, on the manufacture of which Browning commented with mingled wit and pathos.

No picture here is more interesting than Lord Northbrook's large unfinished so-called Fra Bartolommeo, The Holy Family and St. John (217). Its inchoate state informs us of the painter's manner of proceeding, whoever he was, which has been much disputed. The generous owner, relying on documents in his possession, is inclined to attribute it to Raphael, for which there is much, but not quite enough to be said on technical grounds. The Virgin's head is like that of the same personage in Raphael's 'Holy Family,' in the Louvre, No. 1498, painted for Francis I. Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle are disposed to assign it to Raphael del Colle in his old age, and reject Fra Bartolommeo or his pupils. Mr. Weale preferred to award it to Perino del Vaga, a notion with which we cannot agree. It seems to us, as it does to Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle, to be more modern than Fra Bartolommeo's work or that of any one of his pupils, although its composition, style, and motives are like his. The picture came from the Gregori collection at Foligno, and in 1840 was in that of Sir Augustus Foster. It was No. 88 at the Academy in 1871. It is difficult to see why the Franciabigio, No. 219, should be called a Portrait of Raphael, whom it does not resemble. It is an inferior specimen of the master, supposed to be Franciabigio, who painted the much admired 'Portrait of a Young Man,' one of the ornaments of the Salon Carré, and a similar picture is in the Pitti. The Pieta (226), though rather dry and soulless, attracts us, because it is, plausibly enough, ascribed to that rather puzzling artist Timoteo della Vite. But it illustrates his weakness rather than his strength. Nos. 227 and 230, St. John the Baptist and The Infant Saviour, cannot be by Andrea del Sarto, to whom they are ascribed. They owe the qualities which recall him to their being copies by a much later and inferior artist. It is difficult to suppose that the Duke of Westminster's Holy Family and St. John (229) is by Fra Bartolommeo, and not by a later hand of the Romanino class, and it may even be doubted if it be by so good a painter as this suggestion would imply. The Marriage of St. Catherine (231), called a Parmigiano, recalls a Flemish copyist of an original somewhat less ancient than a Parmigiano. To the last-named master several moderately good pictures have been awarded by critics who know no better name for them. Sir J. D. Linton's Virgin and Child (232) illustrates a very pretty and acceptable variety of Andrea del Sarto's work, and may be his. The Virgin and Child (233), ascribed to Fra Bartolommeo, seems to be a copy of a picture of Del Porta's school; while the Head of a Saint (234), attributed to Perugino, is obviously an extremely bad copy of part of a picture in the National Gallery; and No. 259, which is likewise awarded to Perugino, has no business here at all. It is hard to discover how any one had the audacity to ascribe to Raphael such a picture as the Virgin and Child and St. John (237), while there cannot be the slightest doubt that No. 239, The Holy Family, which is fathered on Fra Bartolommeo, is but a bad copy of an indifferent picture of his school. Lord Windsor's Christ bearing the Cross (242), the second panel of the predella of a large altarpiece well known as the "Ripalta Raphael," which was painted by Raphael for the nuns of St. Antonio at Perugia, was not long since at the Academy. At the time it was painted Raphael was beginning to throw off completely Perugino's influence; it illustrates the fine sense of colour he possessed at the time, his strong feeling for movement in his designs, and his rare judgment in composition. We saw it lately at Leigh Court. In the middle of the seventeenth century it belonged to Christina, Queen of Sweden, and was afterwards in the Orleans Collection, whence it was sold in London in 1798, and is engraved in Crozat.

The Portraits of Ferry [Frederic] Carondelet and his Secretary (243) was No. 160 at the Academy in 1882. It is by many ascribed, rather rashly, to Raphael. The present condition of the work deprives the question of anything more than a purely historical interest. It has been stippled over in the clumsiest manner. It is not generally known that this picture, or an original of which it is a version, is represented in the background of 'The Interior of a Picture Gallery,' ascribed to Old Franka, the property of Lord Bute, and lent by him to the Bethnal Green Museum in 1883. Passavant thought Raphael drew the head of Carondelet. It was, according to him, presented as a Raphael by the States of Holland to Bennet, Lord Arlington. It is engraved by Larmessin in the 'Cabinet Crozat' and by N. Dorigny. It is to be regretted that the Virgin and Child (245) from the Grosvenor Gallery should be ascribed by the Catalogue without qualification to Raphael, when it is well known to be a copy of one of the versions of the type of the now lost 'Madonna di Loreto,' the youthful John being substituted for the elderly Joseph. We fail to see the advantage of exhibiting The Annunciation (246) as a Raphael, or, in fact, at all. Another supposed Raphael, Virgin and Child (248), from the Northbrook Gallery, formerly in that of Lord Methuen, whence it was sold in 1844, seems to us, as it did to Waagen and Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle, much more likely to be by Lo Spagna. The weakness of the Virgin's face and the stiffness of her attitude and the Child's lack of energy militate against the ascription to Raphael. It has been assigned to Timoteo della Vite and to Eusebio da San Giorgio. Another version of it is now at Munich, but neither reminds us of Timoteo, whose manner is more jejune and his execution thinner. The Portrait of the Contessina Mattei (249) does not fall in with our notions of Andrea del Sarto's painting, although it is usually attributed to him. It is a fine half-length, life-size figure in a brown dress; the expression is animated and rendered with sympathy. It came from the Agar Collection, and was at the British Institution as No. 36 in 1816, and as No. 121 in 1834, and at the Academy in 1876. Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle thought it might be by Carlo Dolce, which is simply incredible, but their suggestion that Cristoforo Allori may be the author is not impossible. The Vision of St. Jerome (247), which the Catalogue describes as "a finished study for the large picture in the National Gallery," is a rather dull and mechanical copy of Parmigiano's 'Vision of St. Jerome,' No. 33 in Trafalgar Square, itself a laboured and academical piece, which has the distinction of having been mentioned by Vasari, and of being the work upon which the artist was engaged at Rome when Bourbon stormed the city. The copy before us belongs not to the sixteenth century, but to the early part of the eighteenth. Capt. Holford's Virgin and Child (251) is, like most Peruginos, in excellent condition. The same owner lends Bramantino's (Suardi's) portrait of Maximilian Sforza, Duke of Milan (253), which Dr. Waagen, though with some hesitation, accepted as a Titian! While he admired the portrait's "truth and naivety of conception," he justly remarked that "the clear and somewhat red local tones of the flesh" differed from those of most Titians. It has been cleaned, as the doctor suggested it should be. It deserves careful study on account of its highly sympathetic reading of character, its accomplished execution, and careful modelling. The Portrait of a Young Man (256) is not the least like a Raphael. It is, nevertheless, an extremely well-studied picture by a good Florentine painter, who lived at least a generation later. The cap with an eviscine sewn to it, the hair, and the subtly rendered expression of the face are worthy of attention. Mr. Morrison's Portrait of a Lady (280), ascribed, on no good grounds, to Beltraccio, is not, technically speaking, a Milanese picture at all, but nevertheless it is a good specimen of a well-trained painter. The Portrait of a Young Man playing the Lute (284), ascribed to Il Bacchiacca, is thoroughly spoilt, but it may originally have been a good specimen of a master not often seen.

Among the drawings in the North Gallery let us call the visitor's attention to the fine Signorelli, Hercules and Anteus (287), lent by the Queen. One of Raphael's most masculine masterpieces, more beautiful and more highly inspired, is Her Majesty's exquisite Study for the Figure of "Poetry" (288) in one of the rondels of the ceiling of the Camera della Segnatura. Likewise from Windsor is Sketch for the Figure of Christ (270), which we could never get ourselves to believe to be Michael Angelo's. Close to this are Study of a Head (271), a lovely work by Fra Angelico; Study for the Armour of St. Michael (273), by Perugino; Study for the Cartoon of the "Charge to Peter" (275), by Raphael; Portrait of a Young Man (276), by L. di Credi; Study for the Head of an Apostle (277), by Da Vinci; the Shooters at a Mark (279), a famous design in red chalk, and the Bacchante dei Putti (280), by Michael Angelo.

In the Balcony are a number of drawings which deserve attention, although we have not space to write about them. For the same reason we can do no more than mention the collections of ivories, cabinet bronzes, jewellery, medals, armour, printed books, &c. The artist will find most profit and pleasure in studying the ivories, bronzes, and illuminations; and next to them the majolica and medals. While thanking the managers of the New Gallery, we are bound to regret that they have overloaded the exhibition by including medals, printed books, and musical instruments when there was no room for anything like fairly representative collections.

MR. HOOK'S NEW PICTURES.

MR. HOOK'S four pictures at the next Academy will more than sustain his high reputation. To our taste 'Sun Down,' one of the smallest of them, is the most charming, thanks to the abundance and purity of its silvery hues, the harmonies of its colour, and the massiveness of its treatment as a whole. It is a far-reaching view over the sea, athwart a shining pool studded with rushes that has formed in a rocky hollow on the summit of a cliff. From the nearer bank of the pool the eye ranges to the far-off horizon. Here and there the waves break into lines of foam, and, quite in the centre, surge and re-surge about a half-submerged rock, the well-known Shark's Fin of the Cornish coast. The atmosphere is charmingly painted, and the clouds subserve the artist's purpose in respect to the composition, coloration, and chiaroscuro of the picture. Their tonality and local colour are exquisitely true. The sun's descending disc is veiled by them, but its shining track extends across the sea, and forms a splendid feature of the scene, being so introduced as to aid the delightful grading of the distance. The land on the top of the cliff is covered with herbage, the deep tones of which stand out against the sky. In front, a woman, armed with a stick and carrying a milking-stool, follows a cow who loiters to drink from the pool. There are other cows in the middle distance. The effect is that of an early autumnal afternoon in Cornwall, while the air is saturated with light. Another and much larger picture, called 'Seed Time,' has for its motto:—

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil;
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the poor.

Gray's lines are applied to a man in the foreground of a landscape in Surrey, who is taking seed from a bag in order to fill the seedlip on his arm, from which he is about to sow a small plot of sandy soil. A little removed from the front, a boy and a girl stand near a team of donkeys by whose aid they have driven a bush-harrow over the newly-ploughed soil. There is a smile on each of their faces, and the girl turns away to laugh. A pool of clear green water forms a valuable element in the coloration of the picture; so do some dark foliage on the side of an eminence on our right, a field of purplish earth freshly turned, a sandy road leading to a cottage embedded in yews, and groups of trees in the very brilliant green of early spring. In the distance ridges of broken moorland flecked with flying sunlight, lines of dusky hedgerows, and the opposed sides of a shallow valley lead the eye to the silvery gleams and soft shadows of the pale horizon. Nearer, the sky is loaded with undefined greyish clouds slightly tinged with delicate gold and rose. The loveliness of the distance and mid-distance, its spaciousness and delightful harmonies, are the strong points in this fine work, the largest, if we mistake not, of Mr. Hook's productions. 'Practising without a Diploma; or, Rustic Surgery,' is the name of a third picture. It is another Surrey landscape, but it differs in all its elements from the last. In the middle a little river runs along rapidly amid the brilliant light and clear shadows of the fairest autumnal weather. On the one bank lies an open meadow glowing in the sunny air, and on the other are the stems of beeches and underwood. In the foreground a little, rosy-cheeked boy, dressed in rich blue, nestles at the side of his comely elder sister, who, with a needle, extracts a thorn from his finger. The group, which is opposed to the lustrous, many-tinted stream, is invaluable on account of its lines, tonality, colour, and composition, and in these respects is exceptional in Mr. Hook's art. At the girl's feet lies a well-filled basket of blackberries, precious in all respects of painting, colour, and mastery, while her dress of blue, rose, and warm grey is fine, rich, and solid, and is hardly surpassed as a piece of painting by the silver, white, russet, olive, and bronze which impart force and beauty to the surface of the full and quickly flowing stream, where the chief light of the design is concentrated. The shrinking, yet trustful, air with which the boy submits to the operation, the nervous clenching of his disengaged hand, and the tender way in which he presses against the girl's shoulder, are fine touches of design. 'Herring Packers,' or 'A Northern Harbour,' the fourth picture, depicts a little Northumberland port, the pier of which juts out to unite the rocks of a small cove. Some fishing-boats lie alongside in order to deliver their catches of fish, a basketful of which a man is carrying towards the foreground, where three buxom girls are filling casks with herrings taken from a pile at their feet. Such are the incidents of the picture, but its real subject is the calm sky and the sea, and the soft and broken line of the horizon and its ponderous clouds. To these delightful elements are to be added the exquisite azure of the ocean, extending as far as the eye can reach; the rocks covered with weeds; and the splendidly painted fish which are massed upon the grass.

FINE-ART Gossip.

THE Exhibition of the Society of British Artists will be open to the public on and after Monday next.

MR. G. D. LESLIE will not be among the leading contributors to the forthcoming Academy Exhibition: he has only one picture, of moderate size, probably to be called 'Olivia,' and representing a comely girl pouring out tea, and wearing an 'old-fashioned' English gown.

AMONG recent additions to the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities, British Museum, may be ranked the reconstruction of the fragments of a large terra-cotta cornice, part of an archaic temple found by Lord Savile in the ruins of Lanuvium. This relic is surmounted by two antefixæ, between which a lion's head is placed to serve as a spout to carry off water from the gutter behind the parapet. Below the cornice runs a sort of frieze of honeysuckle and lotus flowers, picked out with dark red and yellow on a blue ground, and modelled in relief. This frieze, so called, is painted on the back, a circumstance which indicates how considerable was the projection of the eaves of the temple to which it belonged. The nature of the entablatures of temples like the Parthenon, the backs of which faced the friezes of the cells, is like that of the terra-cotta cornice to which we refer. It is noteworthy that, in order to illustrate the form and character of the relic in question, Dr. Murray took out of the magazine of his department—where, brought from Italy, it had long remained unused—a large cist of soft stone, upon the roof-ridge of which two cats are quaintly perched, with far-projecting eaves, which serve to illustrate the structural arrangements of the terra-cotta cornice. This fragment is more archaic and much finer than the better-known cornice in the Villa Papa Giulio at Rome. The same department has lately been enriched by acquiring a very fine lecythus with a white ground, on which is represented a death-bed scene, the figures including a boy stretched upon a couch and a woman who is bending over the corpse and placing one hand under its chin, an action of well-understood significance; her passionate grief is very finely expressed. Two hillets, with long fringes at their ends, are placed upon the body. At the head of the couch stands a young man who presses his hand to his forehead; at the foot of the couch a second female laments aloud, and is tearing her hair with an expression of intense sorrow. This relic came from Eretria, and dates from c. 460 B.C. The latest considerable acquisition of the department is a most lovely whole-length Tanagra figure of a damsel standing with one leg crossed before the other, and leaning upon a square pillar, her right hand being doubled back upon her hip. Her ample drapery is wrapped close about her, and comprises a garment coloured in pure white over another which is of an intense blue; her hair is dyed deep red.

THE Library Committee of the Corporation of London has appointed to-day (Saturday) for a private view of a loan collection of pictures at the Art Gallery, Guildhall. The Lord Mayor and the sheriffs will attend in state at 2 p.m.

THE private view of Mrs. Allingham's water-colour drawings is appointed for to-day (Saturday), in the gallery of the Fine-Art Society. The public will be admitted on Monday next.

At the Goupil Gallery, 5, Regent Street, Pall Mall, may be seen, until the 11th prox., M. François Flameng's remarkable pictures of incidents in the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, entitled 'The General at Isola Bella' and 'Malmaison.'

THE private view of the Exhibition of the New English Art Club takes place next Saturday, April 7th.

WE mentioned last week that Mr. Henry Wallis's work on Mr. Godman's Persian tiles would be "published"; we understand, however, that it will be issued to subscribers only.

THE Corporation of Glasgow has bought Mr. David Murray's picture called 'Fir Faggots,' which we commended highly when it was No. 13 in the Academy Exhibition of last year.

THE death of Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen from heart disease of long standing—an event which occurred at Lowestoft on the 23rd inst.—was anticipated by all who knew that no one, however robust, would resist the attacks of a terrible and insidious enemy. More than any other cause, his shattered constitution last year compelled this extremely energetic public servant to retire from duties in performing which he had been unusually fortunate. Born in 1828, the third son of Capt. Cunliffe Owen, R.N., he adopted his father's profession when quite a boy, and entered the navy. After five years at sea, and, it was said, because his health failed, he retired from the service and accepted a subordinate post in the then newly formed Department of Science and Art, which, with the late Prince Consort as its official patron, Henry Cole as the chief organizer, and the present Sir J. C. Robinson as the leading art authority, was busy at Marlborough House, where the young Owen rapidly became one of the busiest members of the staff of what was then a decidedly inchoate and far from artistically educated department. Here he soon made his mark, and in 1855 he was one of those dispatched to superintend the British section of the Exposition Universelle at Paris, where his excellent knowledge of the French language, which was not shared by all his colleagues, proved to him a great advantage. In this position he was so successful that in 1860 the South Kensington Museum, or exhibiting branch of the Art Department, was put under his charge as Cole's Assistant Director, but, of course, without the least concern in collecting the examples of which it is formed; that duty was still performed by Mr. Robinson. Cunliffe Owen's business was then, and always remained, that of organizing, as it is called, exhibitions, and superintending the financial and internal affairs of art schools. For this he was well fitted, and although he was nothing like so resourceful and high-handed as Cole, nor so daring and flexible, he proved a clear-headed and able official. With some minor changes of position and responsibility, Cunliffe Owen remained in this position until 1873, when Cole was induced to retire, and Owen, although he was deprived by death of the support of Prince Albert, was appointed to succeed his old chief, with whom he had long been somewhat at issue. In this post he remained, with much credit to himself, just twenty years and won all sorts of honorary distinctions which it is not necessary to enumerate. It is right to say that he had nothing whatever to do with the teaching of what, at South Kensington, is called art.

THE Austrian historical and genre painter Herr Charles von Blum, professor in the Academy at Vienna, is dead, aged seventy-nine years. In 1855 he obtained a gold medal at the Exposition Universelle, Paris, for his 'Charlemagne reproving the Negligent Scholars' (Austria, No. 6). The Gallery of Victories, in the Arsenal at Vienna, contains frescoes of his representing the most important events in the history of Austria.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.

SOME disappointment was caused at the Crystal Palace last Saturday by the statement, mentioned in good time, that the score of Dvorák's new symphony was not available, and that its first performance in England had to be postponed indefinitely. In the place of a work concerning which much has been written in advance, chiefly in consequence of the Bohemian composer's alleged clever employment of negro melodies, two sections of the so-called 'Triple Overture,' his latest orchestral publication, or rather publications, Op. 91, 92, and 93, were presented for the first time. It is asserted that these three overtures have some connected significance, but their titles afford no indication of this. The first is headed 'In der Natur,' the second 'Carnaval,' and the third 'Otello.' If there is any idea of union with respect to these pieces, it must be that the first indicates natural life, the second artificial excitement, and the third the tragedy of existence. With regard to the first overture (for they are distinct and well-rounded works) opinions must be reserved. The next is a singularly bright and picturesquely scored piece, though its lively course is interrupted for a brief space by an andante con moto, which is supposed to indicate a quiet interview of lovers. In the 'Otello' overture the true key-note of tragedy is reached. Though formal outlines are in the main preserved, the work is evidently intended to illustrate the incidents in the last dread scene of Shakspeare's play. We have motives suggestive of the sleeping Desdemona; the Moor's last kiss, which, by the way, closely resembles the "Willow" figure in Verdi's 'Otello'; phrases alternately fierce and tender, indicating the colloquy between Othello and his wife; and a furious passage suggestive of the murder. What is meant to be conveyed by the sequence of harmonies identical with that which has been designated the magic slumber motive in 'Die Walküre' is less clear. But the whole of the material is welded together with much skill and power, though it must be added that the merits of the overture cannot be properly gauged at a first hearing. M. Elkan Kozman made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace, and played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with delicate refined tone and artistic finish as regards manipulation. Miss Marie Brema also made her début at Sydenham, and sang with much force and feeling Gounod's air "Plus grand dans son obscurité," which, however, she had to transpose to a key lower than that in which it is written, and Wagner's 'Schmerzen,' the accompaniments orchestrated by Herr Felix Motil.

HANDEL'S ORIGINAL WIND PARTS TO THE 'MESSIAH.'

March 21, 1894.

A DISCOVERY has just been made of such importance, as bearing upon the much disputed question of additional accompaniments to Handel's works, that I feel sure no apology is necessary for bringing the matter before the readers of the Athenæum. It is a familiar fact that in his will Handel bequeathed "a fair copy of the score and all the parts of my Oratorio called the Messiah to the Foundling Hospital." The Foundling score is well known, and has been frequently examined and described; but the parts, which are of at least equal, if not greater, importance, seem hitherto to have been unaccountably overlooked.

Dr. A. H. Mann, the organist of King's College, Cambridge, is at present making preparations for a performance of the 'Messiah,' to be given in the college chapel in June, with Handel's own orchestration as far as practicable. Knowing that a set of parts had been left to the Foundling by Handel, he asked permission to examine them. The authorities of the Hospital most courteously gave him every facility, but seemed to know nothing of the parts. On searching they were found in a cupboard at the back of the organ loft, where they had lain for so long that their very existence was unknown to any one there. In company with Dr. Mann I spent several hours last week in examining and collating these parts. The results are of extreme interest and importance. Space will not allow me here to go into full details; these I am giving in an article in the Monthly Musical Record; a few of the chief points only can be noticed here. The "complete parts," referred to in the will, prove to be not merely one complete set of vocal and instrumental parts, but sufficient parts for a complete performance. There are fifteen books of instrumental parts and thirteen chorus parts. Assuming that two performers played or sang from each copy, excepting the kettle-drums, we find parts for thirty-three instruments (for Book 15 contains three separate parts) and for twenty-six singers. This proves—what is also established by contemporary documentary evidence—that the band was more numerous than the chorus. But the point of special importance is that there are parts for oboes and bassoons. In none of the original scores of the 'Messiah' is there any indication whatever of bassoons, while oboes are only found in the chorus "Their sound is gone out," which was a subsequent addition to the work. A careful examination of these parts shows that the oboes doubled the violins in the overture, and played in unison with the voices (nearly always with the soprano) in all the choruses excepting the unaccompanied "Since by man came death" and "For as in Adam all die," and the first thirty bars of the "Amen." The bassoons double the basses throughout the overture, in all the choruses, and in the symphonies of nearly all the songs. There can be no question as to the genuineness of these parts, and conclusive proof is thus afforded that the addition of wind parts to Handel's scores is not only no outrage, but is distinctly carrying out the intentions of the composer. Fuller details will be found in the forthcoming article referred to above.

JOHN FRANCIS AND THE 'ATHENÆUM.' A LITERARY CHRONICLE OF HALF A CENTURY.

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"It is in characters so sterling and admirable as this that the real strength of a nation lies.....The public will find in the book reading which, if light and easy, is also full of interest and suggestion..... We suspect that writers for the daily and weekly papers will find out that it is convenient to keep these volumes of handy size, and each having its own index, extending the one to 20 the other to 30 pages, at their elbow for reference."

Liverpool Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis.....As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"A mine of information on subjects connected with literature for the last fifty years."—Echo.

"No other fifty years of English literature contain so much to interest an English reader."—Freeman.

"A fascinating page of literary history."

Illustrated London News.

"Our survey has been unavoidably confined almost exclusively to the first volume; indeed, anything like an adequate account of the book is impossible, for it may be described as a history in notes of the literature of the period with which it deals. We confess that we have been able to find very few pages altogether barren of interest, and by far the larger portion of the book will be found irresistibly attractive by all who care anything for the history of literature in our own time."

Manchester Examiner.

"No memoir of Mr. Francis would be complete without a corresponding history of the journal with which his name will for ever be identified.....The extraordinary variety of subjects and persons referred to, embracing as they do every event in literature, and referring to every person of distinction in science or letters, is a record of such magnitude that we can only indicate its outlines. To the literary historian the volumes will be of incalculable service."

Bookeller.

"This literary chronicle of half a century must at once, or in course of a short time, take a place as a permanent work of reference."

Publishers' Circular.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years.....The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"Rich in literary and social interest, and afford a comprehensive survey of the intellectual progress of the nation."—Leeds Mercury.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."

BURDETT'S HOSPITAL and CHARITIES ANNUAL, 1894.

Being the Year-Book of Philanthropy. Containing a Review of the Position and Requirements of the Voluntary Charities, and an Exhaustive Record of Hospital Work for the Year. It will also be found to be the most Useful and Reliable Guide to British, Colonial, Indian, and American Hospitals, Dispensaries, Nursing and Convalescent Institutions, Asylums, and Charities of all descriptions. By HENRY C. BURDETT. The New Volume for 1894 contains many additions and improvements. The work has been reset in new type and entirely rewritten. Special Chapters deal with the chief events and progress in 1893, the cost of (1) Hospital Management—(2) In-Patients' Maintenance—(3) The Non-Medical Charities—and (4) The Salaries of Officials—The Uniform System of Accounts and Audit—The Construction of Hospitals and Asylums—Hospital Sunday and Saturday Organizations in 1893—In and Out Patients—Nurses and Nursing—and other subjects of interest. The particulars given in every section, as well as those which relate to individual institutions, have been made uniform throughout. No one need now refer to the Annual without finding in its pages, on all the essential points, the desired information.

THE 'YOUNG MAN' ON THE SWAN FOUNTAIN PEN.

2, AMEN CORNER, JANUARY 25, 1894.

Sirs,—I have been using a SWAN PEN for nearly three years, and although I have given it exceptionally hard work, it seems to me to write just as smoothly and comfortably as when I started. I NEVER WANT A BETTER PEN. For men who are constantly scribbling—as I am—the MABIE TODD PEN is indispensable. I simply could not go back to the old hard spluttering steel nib.

THE

BEING A FIRESIDE HISTORY OF A FIFESHIRE FAMILY.

By D. STORRAR MELDRUM.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

Rev. Dr. SPALKER in The BRITISH WEEKLY writes: "It is a tale of passion and retribution." 'The Story of Margrédél' is told with brevity, force, and reticence.....Perhaps the finest thing in the book is the portrait of Mrs. Douglas Oliphant, a woman whose entire history—an uncommonly moving one—the reader seems to know; but it is done with so few strokes that the reader wonders how he knows it. Mr. Meldrum's work has distinct power and originality."—Mr. JEROME K. JEROME's journal TO-DAY says: "The story is in style a little masterpiece. Before I had read five pages I knew I was face to face with a book which would live... ..A place in the front rank among the coming men must be ceded to the author of this delightful book."—Mr. S. L. GIFFEN in The BOOKMAN writes: 'The Story of Margrédél' is a remarkable performance, and carries with it the promise of better work still."—The OBSERVER says: "It is distinctly original and full of a charm quite its own. 'The Story of Margrédél' is written by an artist.....Mr. Meldrum has proved himself master of a style all too rare in its simplicity and graphic power."—The DAILY CHRONICLE says: "Its tragedies are deepened by the entire lack of artifice to heighten their gloom. One feels intensely the reality of the characters.....We warmly congratulate Mr. Meldrum."—The SCOTSMAN says: " 'The Story of Margrédél' is a powerfully conceived and warmly coloured romance.....so skilfully and naturally drawn that every one who seizes the theme of the work will follow its development out admirably to the end."

DAVE'S SWEETHEART.

By MARY GAUNT.

2 vols. 21s.

From the SPECTATOR of March 31.

"It is interesting to watch the literature which is coming over to us from Australia, a portion of which is full of promise, but we may safely say that of all the novels that have been laid before readers in this country, DAVE'S SWEETHEART, in a literary point of view and as a finished production, takes a higher place than any that has yet appeared. We understand that the author has never quitted her native country, and she possesses an exceptional power of reproducing the local colouring. But it is clear, at the same time, that the human element is her main object, and that the touches of description are introduced briefly merely to heighten the effect of some powerful scene. There is considerable art in the treatment of the story, and from the opening scene in the tin store at Deadman's Flat to the closing page we have no hesitation in predicting that not a word will be skipped even by the most blasé of novel-readers. The characters possess the vividness naturally due to those isolated situations where every man and woman is of the highest importance to the people around them, and where the effect of their words and actions are quite out of proportion to the weight they would bear in more civilized and organized communities. The history of the life of the heroine, Jenny, in the police camp, her callous indifference to the suffering she inflicts, and her absorption in her heartless lover, are touched with singular delicacy; while the character of her stepmother, a woman of great brilliance and force, is almost pathetic from her helplessness to cure the evils against which she is struggling. It would not be fair to disclose the story by commenting on the powerful scene of Dave's flight at the end, so we close our remarks with the hope that before long we may have another story from the same pen."

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW NOVELS, &c.

W. E. NORRIS.—'SAINT ANN'S,' the New Novel by W. E. NORRIS, Author of 'The Rogue,' is now ready, in 2 vols., at every Library.

L. T. MEADE.—'A SOLDIER of FORTUNE,' by L. T. MEADE, Author of 'The Medicine Lady,' will be ready, in 3 vols., at every Library on Thursday next.

CHRISTINA CHARD. By Mrs. Campbell Praed, Author of 'Outlaw and Lawmaker,' &c. 3 vols. At every Library.

"The story is original, ingenious, very cleverly written, and deeply interesting.....This is an exceptionally clever and entertaining novel."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Praed has worked out this strange story of a woman's vengeance with considerable resource and vivacity.....Christina herself is a fascinating study; but there are half a dozen other characters of almost equal interest, idealized portraits in every case of types to be met with among the best and brightest circles of fashionable Bohemia."—Athenæum.

DOROTHY'S DOUBLE. By G. A. Henty, Author of 'Rujub the Juggler,' &c. 3 vols. At all Libraries.

"Mr. Henty's new book abounds in variety of scene and interest and changing play of action and emotion.....The plot is carefully thought out and very carefully constructed."—Tablet.

"The plot is developed with a skill that makes every page of the three volumes light and entertaining. The book is eminently readable."—Scotsman.

JACK DOYLE'S DAUGHTER. By R. E. Francillon, Author of 'Ropes of Sand,' &c. 3 vols. At every Library.

"A clever and interesting novel."—Glasgow Herald.

THE ONE TOO MANY. By E. Lynn Linton, Author of 'Patricia Kembell,' &c. 3 vols. Second Edition now ready, at all Libraries.

"The One Too Many" is a delightful book, full of humour and interest. Mrs. Linton is at her best as a story-teller; she writes clearly and brightly; her characters are firmly drawn, and possess a distinct individuality that is sustained from the beginning to the end of the story."—Standard.

"The One Too Many" is a cleverly written and well-constructed novel."—Times.

"The whole book teems with brilliant epigram and sagacious aphorisms: in many respects, as a matter of fact, 'The One Too Many' is fully entitled to rank among the most powerful and remarkable novels of the day."—Daily Telegraph.

IN DIREST PERIL. By D. Christie Murray, Author of 'Joseph's Coat,' &c. 3 vols. At every Library.

"In Direst Peril" is an admirable story of adventure, plot, intrigue, and character.....Mr. Murray tells his story with delightful spirit, and his novel may be recommended to anybody who likes a novel to be readable from cover to cover."—Speaker.

THE COMMON ANCESTOR. By John Hill, Author of 'Treason-Felony,' 3 vols. At all Libraries.

"The Common Ancestor" is really an extremely good story, sparkling, animated, humorous, and with a consistent and exciting plot.....The whole story is admirable."—Leeds Mercury.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

A PROTEGEE of JACK HAMLIN'S, &c. By Bret Harte. With 26 Illustrations.

"Mr. Bret Harte has put his best into the volume of stories entitled 'A Protégée of Jack Hamlin,' and the many admirers of his brilliant originality will find fresh reason for their enthusiasm in the inimitable nerve and quaint humour of each of these tales."—Morning Post.

"There is enough real wit and real pathos to please all moods in this racy little sheaf of stories."—St. James's Gazette.

A DOG and his SHADOW. By R. E. Francillon.

"A platitude of happy wisdom, subtle character, searching and biting sarcasm."—Morning Leader.

"It is a powerful story."—Scotsman.

The SCALLYWAG. By Grant Allen, Author of 'The Tents of Shem,' With 26 Illustrations by Jacobus Houde.

"Clear character-sketching, bright dialogue, and a hundred clever hits at topics of the day will make the time spent in its perusal pass pleasantly enough."—Speaker.

A FAIR COLONIST. By Ernest Glanville. With a Frontispiece by Stanley L. Wood.

"A Fair Colonist" is really a very good story of the adventurous kind—well written, full of incident and variety."—Westminster Gazette.

The KING'S ASSEGAI: a Matabili Story. By Bertram Mitford, Author of 'The Gun-Runner,' With 6 Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood.

"A tale that palpitates with passion."—Morning Leader.

"An admirable example of the tale in which the courage, cruelty, and superstitions of a savage race replace the tamer features of the ordinary novel. No lover of stories of this order should leave 'The King's Assegai' unread."—Speaker.

The QUEEN AGAINST OWEN. By Allen Upward. With a Frontispiece by J. S. Crompton.

"An unmistakable success.....There is high quality in this book, with its vivid glimpses of life and its clever characterization.....Altogether a notable book; and if its popularity be at all commensurate with its merits, then it will have a great vogue."—Sun.

POST-PRANDIAL PHILOSOPHY. By Grant Allen, Author of 'The Evolutionist at Large,' &c. Crown 8vo. Irish linen, 3s. 6d.

"A very charming book.....They are the brightest things of the kind we have seen for some time."—Speaker.

GASPARD DE COLIGNY. By Walter Besant. With a Portrait. Crown 8vo. Irish linen, 3s. 6d.

"The art of the novelist combined with the skill of the historian.....It is delightful.....Readers who were fascinated with Mr. Stanley Weyman's 'A Gentleman of France' will find 'Gaspard de Coligny' of special interest to them, inasmuch as the two books deal with the same stirring times from a diverse point of view."—Morning Leader.

SIR RICHARD WHITTINGTON, Lord Mayor of London. By Walter Besant and James Rice. With Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. Irish linen, 3s. 6d.

"It is delightfully written, and makes its hero quite as interesting in history as he is in his more familiar legendary character."—Scotsman.

PREHISTORIC ANTIQUITIES of the ARYAN PEOPLES. A Manual of Comparative Philology and the Earliest Culture. Being the 'Sprachvergleichung und Urgeschichte' of Dr. O. SCHRADER. Translated from the SECOND GERMAN EDITION by F. B. JEVONS, M.A. In large 8vo. handsome cloth, gilt top, 31s.

"DR. SCHRADER'S GREAT WORK."—Times."Mr. Jevons has done his work excellently, and Dr. Schrader's book is a model of industry, erudition, patience, and, what is rarest of all in these obscure studies, of moderation and common sense."—Saturday Review."It would be hard to find any book more to be recommended to the early student in Philology and Prehistoric Archaeology."—Classical Review."Deserves richly the rank, which has been so generally accorded to it, of a first-rate authority."—Academy.

In 3 vols. demy 8vo. handsome cloth, 21s.

A LITERARY HISTORY of EARLY CHRISTIANITY. By the Rev. C. T. CRUTTWELL, M.A., formerly Fellow of Merton College, Oxford.

"MR. CRUTTWELL has accomplished his task with REMARKABLE SUCCESS. His History is EMINENTLY READABLE. It abounds in eloquent passages on subjects which have a deep interest for men of all times."—Athenæum.

"The Author has accomplished his task ADMIRABLY. I do not know how more could be offered to the general reader than is contained in these 650 pages."

Professor A. HARNACK in the Theologische Literaturzeitung."Precisely such a guide as is needed. Admirably lucid and painstaking."—English Churchman."A MOST INTERESTING account of the literature of the Ante-Nicene age, written in a free and agreeable style, with admirable and lucid descriptions of each author, evincing accomplished scholarship, great literary ability, and historical acumen."—Church Times."The Sections on the Apostolic Fathers, the Apologists, and the Alexandrian writers are VERY SUCCESSFUL and full of instruction. The translations which enrich the work—the Didache, the Letter from the Churches of Lyon and Vienne, and the extracts from the lately discovered Gospel of Peter—will certainly be heartily welcomed by many readers."—Theologische Literaturzeitung.

By the SAME AUTHOR, FIFTH EDITION, in large crown 8vo. cloth, 8s. 6d.

A HISTORY of ROMAN LITERATURE. From the Earliest Period to the Times of the Antonines.

"MR. CRUTTWELL has done a REAL SERVICE to all students of the Latin language and literature. FULL of good scholarship and good criticism."—Athenæum."A most serviceable—indeed, indispensable—guide for the student. The 'general reader' will be both charmed and instructed."—Saturday Review.

A HISTORY of GREEK LITERATURE. From the Earliest Period to the Death of Demosthenes. By FRANK B. JEVONS, M.A., Tutor in the University of Durham.

"BEYOND all question the best history of Greek literature hitherto published."—Spectator.

"Mr. Jevons's work is distinguished by the Author's THOROUGH ACQUAINTANCE with the OLD WRITERS, and his DISCRIMINATING USE of the MODERN LITERATURE bearing upon the subject. His great merit lies in his EXCELLENT EXPOSITION of the POLITICAL AND SOCIAL CAUSES concerned in the development of the Literature of Greece."

Berlin Philologische Wochenschrift.

By the late MAJOR LE CARON.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS IN THE SECRET SERVICE.

The Recollections of a Spy. By Major HENRI LE CARON. With New Preface. 8vo. boards, 2s. 6d.; or cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The Library Edition, with Portraits and Facsimiles, 8vo. 16s., is still on sale.

From the Times, April 2, 1894.—"Whatever may be the verdict of posterity upon his life, Le Caron was in every sense a remarkable man. And if the exigencies of the public service require the services of a spy to track down those who are plotting murder against innocent people, by a parity of reasoning it is difficult to maintain that such a career as Le Caron's is not justified."

MESSRS. METHUEN'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

E. F. Benson.—The RUBICON. By E. F. BENSON, Author of 'Dodo.' 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s. [April 8th.]

The announcement of a new Novel of Society by the Author of the brilliantly successful 'Dodo' will excite great interest, and it is believed that 'The Rubicon' will prove to have as much fascination as its predecessor.

Stanley Weyman.—UNDER the RED ROBE. By STANLEY WEYMAN, Author of 'A Gentleman of France,' &c. With 12 Illustrations by H. Caton Woodville. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. [Shortly.]

Mr. Weyman's fine historical tales have placed him in the front rank of novelists, and this stirring story of Richelieu and the Huguenots will not lessen his reputation.

Baring-Gould.—The QUEEN of LOVE. By S. BARING-GOULD, Author of 'Mehalah,' 'Cheap-Jack Zita,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d. [April 10th.]

A story of the Cheshire salt region—a new district for the exercise of Mr. Baring-Gould's original and powerful gifts.

Mrs. Oliphant.—The PRODIGALS. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s. [In the press.]

F. S. Carew.—JIM B.: a Story. By F. S. CAREW. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

"Permit me to strongly recommend 'Jim B.' 'Tis an excellent piece of work; quoth emphatically the RAMON DE BOORWORMS."

Gilbert Parker.—The TRANSLATION of a SAVAGE. By GILBERT PARKER, Author of 'Pierre and his People,' 'Mrs. Falschion,' &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A story with a powerful and pathetic motive by a writer who has rapidly made his way to the front.

Richard Pryce.—WINIFRED MOUNT. By RICHARD PRYCE, Author of 'Miss Maxwell's Affections,' 'Time and the Woman,' &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.

"A story of society by Mr. Pryce, whose clever pen," says the Athenæum, "has the lightness and ease of Octave Feuillet."

Constance Smith.—A CUCUMBER of the GROUND. By CONSTANCE SMITH, Author of 'The Middle of Lawrence Harland,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

NEW EDITIONS.

Eighth Edition in the press.

Marie Corelli.—BARABBAS: a Dream of the World's Tragedy. By MARIE CORELLI, Author of 'A Romance of Two Worlds,' 'Vendetta,' &c. Seventh Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Miss Corelli's new romance has been received with much disapprobation by the secular papers, and with warm welcome by their religious papers. By the former she has been accused of blasphemy and bad taste; "a gory nightmare," "a hideous travesty," "grotesque vulgarization"; "unworthy of criticism"; "vulgar redundancy"; "drowning details"—these are some of the secular flowers of speech. On the other hand, the Guardian praises "the dignity of its conceptions, the reserve round the Central Figure, the fine imagery of the scene and circumstance, so much that is elevating and devout"; the Illustrated Church News styles the book "reverent and artistic, based on the rock of our common nature, and appealing to what is best in it"; the Christian World says it is written "by one who has more than conventional reverence, who has tried to tell the story that it may be read again with open and attentive eyes"; the Church of England Pulpit welcomes "a book which teems with faith without any appearance of irreverence."

E. F. Benson.—DODO: a Detail of the Day. By E. F. BENSON. Crown 8vo. Thirteenth Edition. 6s.

A story of society by a new writer, which has attracted by its brilliance universal attention. The best critics were cordial in their praise. The Guardian spoke of 'Dodo' as "unusually clever and interesting"; the Spectator called it "a delightfully witty sketch of society"; the Speaker said the dialogue was "a perpetual feast of epigram and paradox"; the Athenæum spoke of the author as "a writer of quite exceptional ability"; the Academy praised his "amazing cleverness"; the World said the book was "brilliantly written"; and half a dozen papers have declared that there was "not a dull page in the two volumes."

Baring-Gould.—CHEAP-JACK ZITA. By S. BARING-GOULD. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A Cheap Edition of a story which has been recognized as Mr. Baring-Gould's most original effort since 'Mehalah.'

TWENTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

Rudyard Kipling.—BARRACK-ROOM BALLADS, and other Verses. By RUDYARD KIPLING. Seventh Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Mr. Kipling's verse is strong, vivid, full of character.....Unmistakable genius rings in every line."—Times.

Henley and Whibley.—A BOOK of ENGLISH PROSE. Collected by W. E. HENLEY and CHARLES WHIBLEY. Crown 8vo.

Also small Limited Editions on Dutch and Japanese Paper, 31s. and 42s. net.

A companion book to Mr. Henley's well-known 'Lyra Heroica.' Each piece, whether containing a character sketch or incident, is complete in itself. The book will be finely printed and bound.

Waldstein.—JOHN RUSKIN: a Study. By CHARLES WALDSTEIN, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Post 8vo. 6s.

Also a Small Edition on Hand-made Paper, demy 8vo. 15s.

This is an appreciation of Mr. Ruskin's work and influence—literary and social—by a critic who has enough admiration to make him sympathetic, and enough discernment to make him impartial.
